"But Mr. Lesley, he didn't seem to wrapped up in the baby as she did," continued Miss Banks, "and I used to fancy she saw it, and fretted about it. He couldn't take her out to dinner anywhere this time, because of her having to attend to the child. She asked him once to take her for a drive somewhere in the country, and to take the child with him; and he looked at her, and said, 'I don't think there's a pleasanter sight in creation than an estimable mechanic in his Sunday clothes, with three children, the eldest about five, and a fourth in arms; but don't you think we may as well leave that sort of thing to the mechanic, Susan? He earns his bread by it, and we don't distinguish himself.' That was just the sort of speech Mr. Lesley used to make to her, and very galling, and scornful, he was always going on in a sneering way about the baby, and her being so fond of it, and never thinking of me at all. He send sometimes one of those nasty speeches of his would set his wife off crying, for her health wasn't very good at that time, and she'd go up into her room, and then he'd look at her with a hard, cruel look that he'd get sometimes, and throw his book into a corner, and get up and walk out of the house, banging the door to that degree that mother would be answered for the rest of the evening, for fear the lodgers should suppose it was a row. At this time, and used to let himself in with a latchkey, long after me and mother had gone to bed, for I never liked leaving the street door on, and I know that he used to be angry with her for doing it; for he used to say he wasn't going to have his wife talking to her as if she was a servant. He was at home for some months the time of the child was born, and I used to go up to see her, and when he was at home he had a tired way like, that made me feel uncomfortable somehow to see him. He was always sitting in the arm-chair, and sitting over his books, or lying asleep upon the sofa; and I'm sure if I'd been Mrs. Lesley, I would have given my child to the parish to get rid of. But for these your heart poor little thing, she fretted about the going away, just as if had been a human creature; and when I used to come back to college say more he was going to Germany this time. I know she was fretting, for I used to hear her kind-hearted thing; and I heard her say to him, so pitiful like, once, 'Oh, Robert, what will become of me and the baby, if you do?' you would only take me!' But he only laughed at her, and cried out, 'What! abandon the baby? Not for the world!' and then he'd look at the child, poor wife got paler and paler every day, till I'm sure she looked like a living corpse walking about the house," said Miss Banks, unconsciously varying phrasing Shelley.

"Lor, yes, to take care for her looking white and sorrowful? He was more wrapped up in his new portmanteaus, and traveling bags, and dressing-cases, and things, than he ever was in his child. He went on as say as could be, though he left her a hundred pounds to spend while he was gone; he didn't leave her too well off either, I know, though she always paid mother to a moment; but he was always buying something or other, and they had bought her in Paris had grown shabby, and he hadn't bought her any new ones. He had so many expenses, he said, and he was always making excuses for him like, and pretended that he was very good to her. Poor dear thing! after he was gone she was only confined a month or two, and I'm sure if it hadn't been for that child she'd have fretted herself away into the grave. Well, you see, the baby was a year old when Mr. Lesley went away to Germany, and he was only to be away three months at the longest, Susan told me in a new hopeful way with me, and I fancy, with her Susan. And she used to count the days just as sure as a schoolboy, and was always saying how long time was going, and her husband would soon be back. She used to write him letters—such long letters, and then she'd get a letter back from him, taking notice, and growing, and such like; but she didn't have many letters from him. You see, Jemima, he's very fond of some place he always she said; 'and then my letters lie at the post-offices where I direct them, and half the time he doesn't receive them at all, or I don't receive at not hearing very often from him.' She used to be so pleased, poor dear, when a letter did come, though I'm sure they were short enough, for I've seen her open them; but, ah! when the three months went by, and Mr. Lesley didn't come back, how dreadfully she did fret!—always secretly, though, for she didn't seem to like that anybody should know her troubles; for fear they should blame him, the brute. 'He's gone to Germany,' she told me; 'Germany's such a big country, you know, Jemima,' and I'm afraid, from what Robert says, he thinks of going beyond Germany, to St. Petersburg, perhaps. You see, it's necessary for him to travel in order to complete his education. I couldn't help laughing outright at this; for I thought if Mr. Lesley wasn't educated enough with all his books and colleges, and examiner languages, and such like, he never would be educated. However, that was no business of mine, and I kept my thoughts to myself. The time went by, and still Mr. Lesley was at the Mr. Lesley coming home. He was always going further and further north, Susan told me, when she spoke of him; but she'd got to talk of him very little now, though I know she was thinking of him and fretting about him all the time, and night too, for I've slept with her sometimes, and heard her moan in her sleep, and speak her name, oh, so pitiful!"

"You're a very good child!" she was little more than a child!" murmured Francis Tredethlyn.

"No more she was," answered Miss Banks, with energy, "and as she showed her was a child, for I'm sure I never thought much of him, with his scornful, sneering ways, treating me and mother as if we was no better than dirt under his feet. And that poor young thing, it was a sorrowful day for her when she first set eyes upon him, the gentlemanthought-himself-to-be-her to distress, and that she was always telling me as a kind of excuse for him, and to keep me quiet, I suppose, as I got fewer and fewer, and still Susan kept her troubles to herself, and only told me was going further north, and that she expected a letter before the year was out. But the year passed, and he didn't come back, and he'd been away nearly ten months and more, when he suddenly popped in one day, with a letter came for Susan, with St. Petersburg on the postmark. I never shall forget that day. It was dull, I remember, and there was wind howling and moaning enough to give the liveliest person the dismals, and Mrs. Lesley had been sitting by the fire-side in a dreadful state, looking for the postman. She was beginning to be nervous about her health, she told me, and I'm sure she was, ever since she had heard from him. The postman came at last, and I was downstairs with mother in the room, when Susan came into the passage and took the letter herself. We heard the parlor door shut, and then five minutes afterwards we heard a scream as never I heard in me and mother rushed upstairs, and there was poor Susan lying on the floor, with a letter clutched in her hand, and her face as white as chalk. I'm sure she was no more mother could loosen them. We lifted her up and laid her on the sofa. She didn't seem to know us, though, and cried for she opened her eyes directly, and said, 'Oh, my child!' and then she lay there quite still dead. And it was enough to make her, for she'd got to hear her husband was living married again, and that he'd been living married again all through the troubles of the world. She asked her if there was bad news in the letter. 'Oh, mother!' she cried; 'cruel news—dreadful news!' And then mother asked her, was Mr. Lesley dead? Was he killed? Had he sent for me? Mother fancied she meant he was really dead, and said she hoped Mrs. Lesley was left comfortably provided for. You see, having seen a deal of trouble herself, mother will think things in that light. And then Susan cried out that her husband was living, and was no more understood. I couldn't bear to leave her; but I get mother out of the way—for her ways are apt to be wearing to a sick person—and I sat down by the side of poor Susan all the evening. But she never spoke once; she only lay quite quiet upon the sofa, with her face turned to the wall, and I knew that she was crying all the time; and when I took her the baby, which was awake, she might comfort herself, she only waved him away like, with her hand. I didn't leave her till twelve o'clock that night; but she never spoke to me, but kept with her face turned to the wall. But just as I was going away she stretched out her hand and said, 'God bless you, Jemima, for your kindness to me; you've been kind, but there is nothing upon this wide earth that can give me any comfort now.' I didn't see her the next morning, for I was busy with my own child and took the baby with her, and she didn't come back till late at night, and then she came back without the baby. She'd been to see Mrs. Lesley, and left her with a feather when I opened the door to her and saw her come in without the child. 'Oh, Susan,' I said, 'what have you done with Robert?' for I'd been christened Robert after his pa, and I'd stood godmother to him. Susan said he was quite well, but she said very quietly, 'I've put him out to nurse in the country, Jemima. I was obliged to provide for him, and I've done it away. I thought till a moment that she was going abroad to her husband, and that her grief had been about parting with her child, and that I'd misunderstood her; but she'd said the night before, about Mr. Lesley being dead to her, and do what I would I couldn't make it out. I'm afraid she has made much of the thought of her going away as if she'd been my own sister."

"I wish to heaven she had stopped with you," exclaimed Francis Tredethlyn. "She had few friends, poor girl, and had no need to leave any one who felt a kindness for her."

"But she did leave us," replied Miss Banks; "she paid mother every farthing she owed her, and packed up her few little things. She would make me take some of her pretty ribbons and collars, that had been bought in Paris, and never said one word to me about her intentions, and when Mr. Lesley was not at home; and then she sent for a cab and went away. I heard her tell the driver Southampton railway station, for I went out to the cab and kissed her the last thing, and begged her to come back soon whenever she came back to London; and she promised that if she lived, and things went well with her, she would. But from that day to this we've never set eyes upon her."

And this was the end of what Miss Banks had to tell Francis Tredethlyn's thoughts wandered back to Mrs. Burfield; it was to her that Susan Tredethlyn had gone in the hour of her need. So far the girl's history was complete; but the grand question still remained, Where was she now to be found? A deserted wife, a friendless and propless penniless mother; what had become of the lonely, much-neglected girl between the March of 1851 and this present autumn of 1853.

"But surely you can give me some clue by which I may trace my cousin?" said Francis, after a pause; "you can give me the address of some friend, some intimate acquaintance of Mrs. Lesley's, to whom she had visited while he had been here?"

Jemima shook her head decisively.

"Not one," she answered; except for bringing his brother home to dinner once or twice, when I was there myself, and remember him admiring, as Mr. Lesley ever darkened mother's door. Mother and me used to think it odd, and of course there always was a reason for people bringing their friends company, which makes up for extra trouble; and the most audacious lookers-up that ever were one's got to look up under visitors' very noses. But we supposed, as Mr. Lesley's marriage was a secret one, he didn't care to bring his friends home."

"But his brother came?"

"Yes, only when they were first married; he never came after."

"Did you hear the brother's address?"

"Well, I have heard that it was in some of those low places, the Temple, or Gray's Inn; but I never heard say nearer than that."

Francis Tredethlyn gave a despairing sigh; he thought of Mrs. Burfield's description of his cousin, pale and wan, waving her little hand out of the window as the coach set off, and of Susan, friendless and poor. Was it not more than likely that she had gone away to die, and that his search for her would end at last in the discovery of a grave?

But might not the man, the husband who had deserted his innocent and confiding wife, might not he be found and made to pay a heavy penalty for his sin? Vengeance seems but a poor thing when the sin is past; it is at best considered; and Francis Tredethlyn felt a fierce desire for revenge against the cold-blooded destroyer of his cousin Susan's happiness.

He asked Miss Banks many more questions, but she could tell him no more than she had already told him. She had never heard Mrs. Burfield or Mr. Lesley's family or antecedents, directly or indirectly. She knew no more to college, than she never remembered hearing what college. She had decided sometimes that Mr. Lesley's name was not Lesley at all, but some other name which, for when his brother had come to dine at Woodcote Villas the first time, he had inquired for Mr. Smith by every one except Mrs. Burfield, and that other name had entirely escaped Miss Jemima's recollection.

Francis found himself up short," she said, "and he was vexed with himself for having let slip that other name, and I never heard it again the whole time they were lodgers. I'm sure I've often and often thought since how much more about her husband's affairs than I did, for he always treated her like a child, and never spoke to her on any thing of any importance, and I'm sure she never seemed to have a high and mighty way with her, that would have kept any timid person from asking questions."

Francis thanked Miss Banks very heartily for the trouble she had taken to enlighten him to the extent of her power, and then bade her good afternoon.

"If you should meet with any one wanting apartments, my good friend, you can tell them," you'll perhaps be kind enough to bear mother in mind," the young lady said, as she escorted him to the door.

He murmured some polite assurance that he would neglect no opportunity of promoting Mrs. Burfield's interest, and returned to the Hermon which had been waiting for him during his prolonged interview with the pretty Jemima.

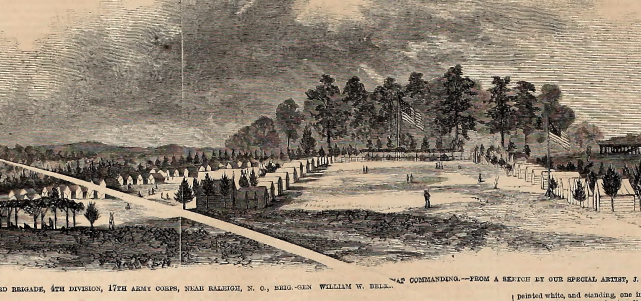
From Woolcote Villa he drove to the office of the Marylebone registrar, and from that official he obtained the information that the marriage between Robert Lesley and Susan Turner, on the twenty-fifth of February, 1850, was, so far as his part of the business went, legally performed; but that the ceremony had been performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury within the solemn precincts of Westminster Abbey.

"If they chose to be married in false names, that was their business," said the registrar, "and I thought the gentleman looked honorable in byand-bye. But, except where there's property, it isn't often that a person's called upon to prove their identity, I suppose, by us; during the inquiry, there is property in the case?"

Francis Tredethlyn shook his head.

"I can't say more about that than you do," he said.

"Well, I don't forget that business in a hurry," said the registrar, who was inclined to be communicative. "In the first place, the man was one of a pretty middling, shabby-genteel sort, and one of party we don't often see here; and in the next place he gave me a twenty pound note, which is not a thing we're overrun with, and was ever dropped into my pocket, and is more than likely to be the last."



"Can you tell me what the man was like?"

"Tall and fair, with blue eyes and light hair; your regular swell; not the heavy military guild of swell at all, but something that way with him; but such as you may see by the dozen any afternoon in St. James's Street or Pall Mall."

The description was no clearer than that given by Jemima Banks. Francis could scarcely walk through a London street without meeting with some man who might be described in the same words. He left the registrar's office, and went back to his hotel, and, absorbed in his ominous fancies of his sister, thought alternately of lost Susan Tredethlyn, alias Susan Leslie, and of deserted Maude Hillary, who was soon to be his wife.

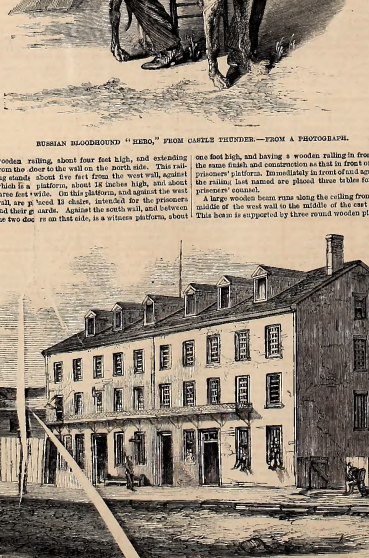
CAMP OF THE 3RD BRIGADE, 4TH DIVISION, 17TH ARMY CORPS, NEAR RALEIGH, N. C.; BRIG.-GEN. WILLIAM W. BELK... ...AP COMMANDING.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, J. E. TAYLOR.

CAMP OF GEN. BELKNAP'S BRIGADE.

On this page is a sketch of the beautiful camp of the 3d brigade, 4th division, 17th army corps, of Sherman's army, near Raleigh, N. C. This famous brigade is commanded by Brig.-Gen. William W. Belknap, of Iowa, and was originally organized by Brig.-Gen. M. M. Crocker, at Pittsburg Landing, Tennessee, shortly after the battle of Shiloh, in which, as well as in Sherman's marches and battles, all these regiments participated. This camp has attracted great attention on account of its admirable arrangements and the manner in which it has been ornamented. In camp, as well as in battle, Sherman's heroes are invincible. The following regiments compose the brigade:—13th Iowa Vet. Vol., Lieut.-Col. Don. Beach; 13th Iowa Vet. Vol., Lieut.-Col. J. C. Kennedy; 15th Iowa Vet. Vol., Lieut.-Col. George Pomutz; 16th Iowa Vet. Vol., Major J. Henry Smith; 32d Illinois Vet. Vol., Lieut.-Col. John J. Rider.



THE TRIALS OF THE ASSASSINS.

The picture we publish to-day on page 168, representing the all-absorbing topic of the day, the trial of the conspirators and assassins of President Lincoln, is one of historical interest. The Court is held in the Arsenal building, Washington, and is composed of a Military Commission, of which Gen. Hunter is President, and Gen. Joseph Holt is Judge-Advocate and Recorder. The names of the prisoners are: David E. Harrold, George A. Atzerott, Lewis Payne, Michael O'Laughlin, Edward Spangler, Samuel Arnold, Mary E. Surratt and Samuel A. Mudd. They have all pleaded not guilty, though it is said that Payne, who made the assault on Secretary Seward, has made a full confession of his guilt. He is described as tall, almost boardless, broad-shouldered, and would make a model from which to paint a gladiator. He is kept well ironed, a bar of steel about a foot long separates his wrists. Mrs. Mary E. Surratt, who is now represented as the arch criminal among those before the commission, is a native of Maryland, and at the time of her arrest was keeping a boarding-house in Washington, which was the resort of the conspirators. Mrs. Surratt is a woman of imperious will, and has maintained a defiant and unrelenting bearing, but is said now to be quite dejected, having evidently begun to realize her position. Her daughter, who appears not to be seriously implicated, is very sick. Her son is believed to have made his escape to Canada. Hon. Reverdy Johnson appears as her counsel, and several lawyers have been retained as counsel for the other prisoners. Dr. Mudd is the physician who set Booth's broken leg on the night of the murder. Arnold is the correspondent of Booth's, whose letter was found in the latter's trunk. Spangler is the stage carpenter at Ford's theatre, who held the horse on which Booth escaped on the night of the murder.

The trial commenced on the 9th of May, and still continues. On the first day the proceedings were in secret, but on Saturday the court was thrown open and the suppressed evidence published. The ceiling of the room in which the trial is held is ten feet from the floor, which is covered with thick drab matting. There are two windows of medium size opening upon the east, and two square large looking out to the north. Across these windows, on the outside, run heavy flat iron bars crossing each other perpendicularly and horizontally, leaving openings between them about eight inches square. On the south side of this room there are two doors, each opening on the adjoining corridor, painted and fitted up in similar character to those below, but having in addition in each a neat bedstead and bedding and washstand. In the west end of the court-room, near the south-west corner, is a heavy prison door, leading to the cells in the adjacent part of the building. Through the door the prisoners are brought to and taken from the presence of the commission.

In the west end of the room, commencing immediately at the east side of the door last named, is a painted white, and standing, one in the middle of the beam and the others each at a distance of eight feet from the centre pillar. A table, about 12 feet long and three feet wide, stands between these pillars and the north wall, and is surrounding this table are the chairs for the members of the commission. At the foot of this table, and between it and the attorney's table, is another for the Judge-Advocate General and his two assistants. A table of the same dimensions and finish as that at which the [illegible] sat, is placed in a corresponding position between the pillars and south wall of the room. Here sit the official reporters and the representatives of the press. Immediately adjoining the door by which the prisoners enter is the usual seat and table, at which he enters the room, the "general aide," which the special Provost-Marshal [illegible] last mentioned.

Entering the court-room from the door last mentioned, you are met first by Gen. Hartuff. Upon stepping a few feet to the left, and facing the west, the eye is first attracted to the assemblage, in brilliant full dress uniforms, ranged round the table on the right. At the east end of this table sits Maj.-Gen. David Hunter, the presiding officer. On his right, at the south side of the table, sits Maj.-Gen. Lew Wallace. On the opposite side, and to the left of the President, is Brevet Maj.-Gen. August V. Kautz, and so on, on either side, are ranged the other members of the commission, in the order of their rank. Judge Advocate-General Holt sits at the north end of the table, and at the right are his assistants, Col. H. L. Burnett and Judge Bingham. Facing the commission, near these, is Hon. Reverdy Johnson. Arnold is around him are the other counsel for the prisoners.

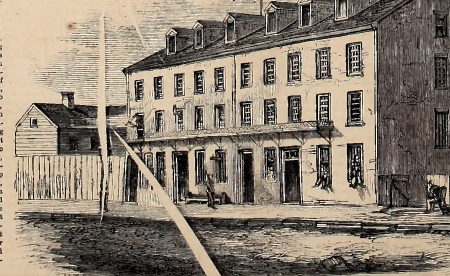
wooden railing, about four feet high, and extending from the door to the wall on the north side. This railing stands about five feet from the west wall, against which is a platform, about 14 inches high, and about three feet wide. On this platform, and against the west wall, are placed 13 chairs, intended for the prisoners and their guards. Against the south wall, and between the two doors on that side, is a witness platform, about one foot high, and having a wooden railing in front, of the same finish and construction as that in front of the prisoners' platform. Immediately in front of and against the railing last named are placed three tables for the prisoners' counsel.



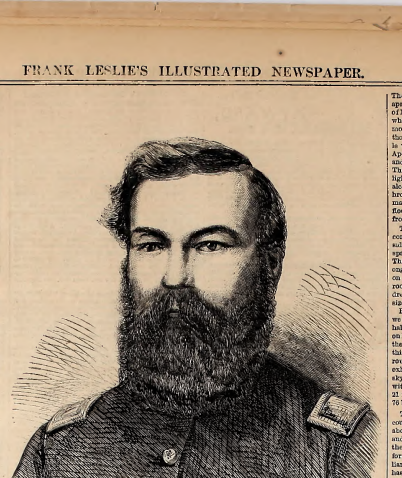
A large wooden beam runs along the ceiling from the middle of the west wall to the middle of the east wall. This beam is supported by three round wooden pillars,

CASTLE THUNDER, RICHMOND.

This famous rebel prison, the scene of countless atrocities, is at the corner of 19th and Cary streets, Richmond, and is used at this present time for the confinement of civil offenders. It is full of rebel-horse outcasts, with a sprinkling of refractory colored individuals.

Russian Bloodhound from Castle Thunder.

The famous Russian bloodhound Hero, from Castle Thunder, has been sent to Washington in a close carriage, creating quite a sensation in the capital. Hero was formerly owned by one of the keepers of Castle Thunder, and kept there as one of the preventives against prisoners escaping. He belongs originally to the tribe of "heavy dogs," stands feet long from the tip of his nose to the end of his tail, is three feet eight inches tall, measuring from the fore-shoulder down, and weighs 178 pounds. On two occasions, before he was three years old, he whipped what was then a Duke Island. A royal dog would hardly give a better growl. Mr. Munn, editor, 140th New York, brought Hero. He commenced only a few days ago. At first he had an intense dislike—the result of his previous teachings no doubt —to one of our soldiers' blue uniforms; but he is rapidly overcoming this antipathy, and daily gives indication of growing tolerance of Union soldiers and Union sentiment.



CASTLE THUNDER, REBEL PRISON IN RICHMOND, VA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

The introduction of the style of riding sideways on horseback is attributed to Anne of Bohemia, consort of Richard II. She it was (according to Stow) who originally showed the women of England how gracefully and conveniently they might ride on horseback sideways. And the old historian, enumerating the new fashions of Richard II.'s reign, observes: "Likewise noble ladies then used high bonds, and coverts, and rebos with long trains, and rode on side-saddles on their horses, by the example of the honourable Queen Anna, daughter of the King of Bohemia, who first introduced the custom into the kingdoms; for before, women of every rank rode as men." Shetland, in his beautiful illustrative picture of Chaucer's Canterbury Pilgrims, appears (according to the above-quoted authorities) to have committed an anachronism in placing the most conspicuous female character of his fine composition sideways on her steed. That the lady ought to have been depicted riding in the male fashion, might have been inferred, without any historical research on the subject, from the poet's describing her as having "on her foot," "a pair of spurres sharpe."

LIEUT.-COL. BENJ. D. PRITCHARD, FOURTH MICHIGAN CAVALRY.

By the official announcement of the capture of Jeff. Davis, the 4th Michigan cavalry, commanded by Lieut.-Col. Benjamin D. Pritchard, has the glory of this crowning act. Col. Pritchard entered the service as captain in the 4th Michigan cavalry, his commission dating August 18, 1862. His regiment rendezvoused at Detroit, was mustered into the United States service on August 20, and left for Kentucky in September following. Col. Pritchard, during his captaincy, took part in the advance during the attack on Morgan's guerillas at Stanford, and joined in the pursuit as far as Owl's Orchard, Kentucky. On November 3, 1862, he took part in the chase after Morgan, in which the rebel chief was driven across the Cumberland, and nearly captured to rout. Subsequently he participated in the operations against Murfreesboro and in the pursuit of Forrest and Wheeler towards Fort Donelson. During the campaigns of 1863 and 1864, in Tennessee and Georgia, the 4th Michigan took again a conspicuous part. For gallantry in the various actions of his regiment Capt. Pritchard was promoted to the rank which he now holds.

It is unnecessary to repeat here the series of skilful and quickly executed movements, under the immediate command of Col. Pritchard, which have resulted in Davis's capture. It is hoped this satisfactory success is but the forerunner of a more definite termination of the ex-Presidential rebel's career.

RECEPTION OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,

At Richmond, Virginia.

On the 5th of May, Richmond was enlivened by the passage through the city of a considerable portion of the Army of the Potomac, consisting of the 2d and 5th corps, commanded respectively by Gen. Humphreys and Gen. Griffin. In the absence of Major-Gen. Ord, commanding the department, and Major-Gen. Gibbon, commanding the 24th army corps, Major-Gen. J. W. Turner, accompanied by Gen. Ord's staff, undertook the honors of the honorary reception of the veterans by the Army of the James. The troops representing the Army of the Potomac entered the city by the pontoon bridge spanning the James between Richmond and Manchester.

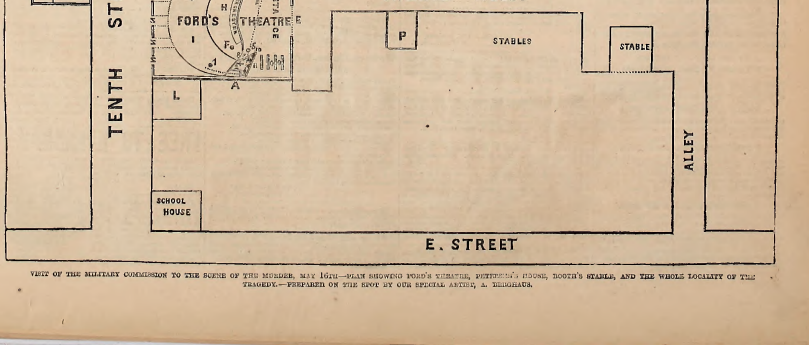
NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

THE new building of the National Academy was formally opened on the evening of the 27th ultimo, and with this inauguration the institution may be fairly said to enter upon a new era of its existence.

The design of the building was furnished by Mr. P. B. Wright, and the work has been executed under his supervision. The site, which consists of an entire lot, at the corner of 4th Avenue and 23d street, was purchased in 1860, at a cost of $50,000. The building is 86 feet long on the avenue, and 80 feet wide on 23d street, and when fully completed will cost, in the aggregate, $175,000. It is three stories high, besides the cellar. The basement story contains, on 23d street, the janitor's apartments, and on the avenue the rooms of the School of Design. The latter occupy about three-fourths of the whole area of this story, and furnish quite ample accommodations. The entrance to the School of Design is on the avenue. The collection of casts of ancient statuary is very large, embracing such works as the Laocoon, Apollo Belvidere, Venus de Medici, Silenus and Bacchus, and many others equally valuable to the student in art. This department occupies three large alcoves, well lighted, and covering a space of 47 by 66 feet. The alcoves are supported by tasteful columns, of a rich brown tint, with golden-leaved capitals. The department of the Life School occupies a hall on the same floor, 37 by 54 feet, fronting the north, and partly lighted from a cupola.



The entrance to the upper stories is on 23d street, and consists of a double flight of marble steps, rising outside the building, and leading through a beautiful and spacious doorway into the hall on the second floor. This hall is 12 feet wide, and runs nearly the entire length of the building. East of the hall, and fronting on the avenue, are the reception-room, the two library rooms, and the council-room. On the other side are two dressing-rooms for ladies and gentlemen, and a good-sized lecture-room.

Rising from this hall by a grand balustraded stairway, we ascend to the third story. We enter at first a sort of hall, 34 by 40 feet, divided by a double arcade, resting on beautiful columns of various-colored marble. Around the walls are hung a goodly number of pictures. From this hall three are entrances to the galleries which surround it on all sides. This story is devoted entirely to exhibition purposes. The galleries are all lighted by skylights, and for the present are sufficiently spacious, with the exception of the sculpture-room, which is only 21 feet square. The other four galleries are, severally, 76 by 36, 46 by 72, 40 by 30 and 76 by 21 feet.

The walls of the basement story are of Westchester county marble, banded with North River brownstone; above, they are of white marble, with similar bands, and at the third story they are of white and gray marble, the latter color being arranged in diamond outlines, forming a sort of checkerwork. This work gives a peculiar, wavy appearance to the masonry, which no one who has seen the walls can fail to have noticed. Some are extravagant enough to think this is a beauty. Although manifestly a defect, it is not a serious one. In the Doge's palace, in Venice, from which this building was modelled, this diamond work is on a much larger scale, and is made of a warm-tinted stone, which does not cross the lines of masonry with so violent a contrast. In other words, its tone of color and luminosity being of about the same degree as that of the surrounding wall, the whole appears to the eye more nearly on the same plane.

The building, as we have just stated, was modelled after the Doge's palace at Venice, and is of that mixed style of architecture sometimes called Venetian Gothic. It is much smaller than the original, and the reduced proportions and strange surroundings into which it has been translated, give but a poor idea of the grandeur and beauty of its prototype. The architecture of the building has, first and last, provoked a great deal of adverse criticism; and its advocates seem to have found but one impregnable position—and that is in its uniqueness.

It is not the most graceful and ennobling sight in the world to behold one's hero at his roast beef. A lady relates that having long worshipped Fanny Kemble afar off, some friend contrived to procure her a nearer glimpse at a dinner-party. That view revealed the queen of tragedy with open mouth and a respectable morsel of meat labouring before it. The sublime attitudes all how down before this. Charlotte Bronte fared no better with her "Lion of Judah." She was seated opposite Mr. Thackeray at table, and herself always eating lightly, was doomed to nervously watch her mighty men. He

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES.

$250,000,00.

Be authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three cents per cent. interest per annum, known as the Seven-Thirty Loan.

These Notes are issued under date of July 15th, 1865 and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per cent.

GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the securities named herein, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum, to their value, according to the rate of taxation in other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest at 7 30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note,
Two cents " " "	"	$100 "
Ten " " "	"	$500 "
20 " " "	"	$1000 "
$1 " " "	"	$5,000 "

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notice of this Loan is but a mere particular similar to those and exchange at the lowest current rates, except that the interest commences from the day of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent. instead of 7 3-10ths in currency. Subscribers will therefore lose the amount of interest on the gold value of the bonds subscribed.

The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-thirties will commence on the 1st of June, and will be made promptly in the order of time in which the subscriptions are received.

The above offer made in the conditions of this Third series affects only the matter of interest. The payment in all respects will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of would so reduce and equalize prices, that purchases made with a par in gold would be found to be equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. [sic]

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

now offered by the Government, and its superior advantages will make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $230,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will be all subscribed for within sixty days when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has already been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be allowed facilities for taking the loan the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical PINEAPPLE CIDER
Is a PREVENTIVE OF SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last twenty-five years in addressing the public as the manufacturer of the celebrated Talbot's Odontalgic Carbon, entitles the articles offered by Dr. Talbot's Medicinal Pineapple Cider, confidence from all classes, old and young. It is not new to the public, but has been before them for years. One quart bottle will last a week person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring—preventing sickness rather than curing sick. Is it not better to pay five dollars a year to keep well—better than paying a day ten or twenty dollars to doctor's bills, and sometimes more for the loss of time and the suffering and anguish which it entails. To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one spoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. This will increase the vitality and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York physician says he would make a fortune if he had the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained one person every day in consequence of the first trial. He continues its use as severe disorders, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman of New York says that the Medicated Cider never disorders or tires, and has not been sick one day during last time.

This wonderful Preparation will increase the digestive powers, give new action to the system, and regulate the secretions. When taken internally, for pallors of the heart, Dyspepsia, Diarrhœa, Diseases of the Kidneys, Pains in the Chest, Hoarseness, Coughs, Neuralgia, &c., &c., for soothing and quieting effect on the system, it is unequaled by any medicine.

Externally, as a wash for the face, it is surprising with what success it is treating Severe Dyspepsia, Nervous Headache, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Palpitation of the Heart, Chronic Diarrhœa, Cold Dysentery, and Disorders of the Kidneys and Liver. It is also particularly recommended by physicians to delicate females, as an invigorating tonic, and for Bed-ridden Invalids. Wear of Appetite, Sciatica, Neuralgic Affections, Headaches, &c., &c. Also, for Sore Throats, Sore Eyes, Tumors, Wakefulness, Disturbed Sleep, etc. American Ladies! Here is a remedy with great success in Southern climate and beauty. It imparts cheerfulness to the countenance, and is a delightful companion to travelers especially in a of fastidious taste, and should be provided with a bottle for every journey, to which the water is likely to vary in quality and temperature. Every family should have a bottle always kept it with the utmost confidence as a family, cheerful companion.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 167 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Valuable Jewellery, originally intended for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have resolved upon a Great Gift Apportionment to be divided according to the following regulations:

CERTIFICATES of the various articles are first put into envelopes indiscriminately, sealed up, and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus shewing no favoritism.

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

Send 25 Cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for 10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered for them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps. ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, varying in value, and all are offered for $1 each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certificate of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, and are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with the article, which will certainly be worth more than that amount, and may be $50 or $100. An excellent mode this of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, New York City, Feb. 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy of public confidence.—New York Scottish American Journal, June 11, 1864.

We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency for European Manufacturing Jewellery, a large assortment of fashionable and valuable jewellery of the newest patterns. We also noticed a large quantity of silver-plate, and understand that the whole of these newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a novel principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents. We know the firm in question to be a very respectable and thoroughly worthy of public confidence, and recommend our friends to read their advertisement.—New York Albion, Sept. 3, 1864.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co's arrangement, the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he has everything to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. He knows what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—New York Weekly News, Aug. 6, 1864.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, not only filling her own purse, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sold the Certificates, as will be seen from our advertising columns. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged.—New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1864.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewellery and silver-ware. In payment of that advertisement we received several sets of the jewellery advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Lewistown), Aug. 17, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 20 articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients and some of them six times

The Grand Review.

Tuesday and Wednesday, the 23d and 24th of May, were proud days for our gallant soldiers of the Army of the Potomac and the Army of the West. On these days there passed through the streets of the National Capital, in review before the President, an army of 200,000 veteran soldiers, the finest, most experienced, and most effective on the globe. They were on their return to their homes, which they left voluntarily at their country's call, after having marched more miles and fought more battles—severe and bloody battles—than any equal number of men in history. These were the men who, starting from the banks of the Ohio, beyond the Alleghanies, fought their way to the Gulf, swept around the mountains and up between them and the Atlantic, until they reached again the parallel of latitude from which they set forth, fighting their way for 2,000 miles through and through the so-called Confederacy, and trampling its vaunted power into the very dust. There was that veteran army, sometimes shattered but never broken, that heroic, patient, invincible army of the Potomac, which, in spite of bad generalship, faithlessness even, on the part of some of its officers in the early period of the war—in spite of disaster and circumstances of greatest discouragement, has interposed itself between the capital and the enemy, and not only resisted the shock of his greatest power, wielded by his greatest generals, but has flung itself always with undiminished courage and a valor truly heroic, upon the very stronghold and citadel of rebel strength, until it fell at last before their heavy and reiterated blows. It is no disparagement of the other grand national armies in the field to say that it was the Army of the Potomac that had to resist the weight of the rebel strength. Against them the power of the rebellion was mainly concentrated and consumed. Whether attacking or defending, it was the Army of the Potomac, with its mighty sledge, that battered the traitor fabric into the dust. Look at Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, Seven Pines, Malvern Hill, the second Bull Run, South Mountain, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorville, Gettysburg, the Rappahannock, the Wilderness, Cold Harbor and Petersburg! Here it was that the flower of the rebel armies was gradually consumed and finally destroyed. With the Army of the Potomac, always vigilant and undismayed, prodigal of its blood, crouching like a lion before Richmond, the Confederate Government was unable to adopt those swift and overwhelming combinations of forces, which their possession of inner lines of communication would otherwise have made feasible, and thus it was that the work of subjugation in other fields was made more easy. The Army of the Potomac received the first blow of the war; it struck the last, and the rebellion went down before it. The humiliations of Bull Run were a hundred times avenged. Glory and honor to the heroes of the Army of the Potomac, that battered down the rebel fortunes! Honor and glory to the victors of Murfreesboro, Chattanooga, Missionary Ridge, Atlanta and Nashville—that gallant and notable army that proved, by an act of daring unparalleled in the history of war, the hollowness of a Government based on injustice to men, and the weakness of an organization which did not represent the whole people.

As organizations, the Armies of the Potomac and of the West will soon disappear; but for all time the men will be proud to say "My father marched with Sherman," or "followed Grant from the Potomac to the Appomattox." The confidence of a benumbed conscience, a famine or the other of these historical armies will be cherished heirloom, not second to those which men transmit up to show that their fathers stood by Putnam at Bunker Hill or with Washington, at Yorktown. "All is quiet on the Potomac" now. Its army has gone into history.

the First and Second Nos. of Frank Leslie's

A NEW FAMILY PAPER,

THE CHIMNEY CORNER will have always a continuous tale of a superior and unexceptionable order. It opens with a most exciting story from one of the most popular and successful dailies. Each number will also have a variety of short or stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and of Society, Anecdotes of National History, Poetry, Poetry, Agricultural and Horticultural Suggestions and Illustrations, Recipes, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Merry Thoughts, Comic Pictures, Portraits and Illustrations, in the best style of American art.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER starts with a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and large experience. It starts assured of success, and of gathering together a host of readers which will widen daily, and to which it will prove an instructor and an entertaining friend and guest.

In addition to these literary attractions THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the designs being made expressly for it by the most eminent Artists.

Every number will also contain a most striking and correct portrait, exquisitely engraved, with an original biography of some eminent person, who has risen by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic. This series will be unrivaled.

"The Self-Made Men of our Times."

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mr. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

The Yellow Fever Plot.

Among the schemes of the rebel plotters in Canada, where traitors had asylum and sympathy, and whence they levied war with impunity, was one to spread the loyal States with that most dreaded of diseases, the yellow fever. When it was announced some weeks ago that a Dr. Blackburn had been arrested in Toronto, Canada West, and put under bonds to answer a charge of having been engaged in a plan to scatter clothing infected with the virus of yellow fever in the principal Northern cities, and in the towns occupied by our armies, the public was not inclined to look on the matter seriously. In the first place the question whether the yellow fever is infectious, like that whether saltpetre will explode, is an open one; and secondly it was difficult to imagine a malignity so demoniac as that which would involve whole communities in the horrors of an epidemic, which tradition as well as experience has led us to regard as most fatal and terrible. But the evidence in the case of Blackburn shows positively not only that an attempt of the most diabolical kind was actually made last year, but was intended to be renewed this summer. Its realization was only prevented by the sudden collapse of the rebel power and the extinction of the so-called Confederacy. Like the plot of hotel and theatre burning in New York, and the more successful one of assassination in Washington, this was probably one of those schemes which Sanders explained to Sala, and which were to "make the world stand agape at with horror!" Of the complicity of the rebel gang in Canada with the incendiary and murderous plans that have come to light, and which still almost paralyze us by their atrocity, there is no doubt: but the direct proof has not been in all respects complete. Not unnaturally, for the participants in such crimes have generally sufficient cunning to leave as few tangible evidence of their guilt available for the ends of justice. Their work, as a rule, is in the dark and without witnesses. But in the case of Blackburn, with his yellow fever scheme, the usual precautions of cunning crime seem to have been strangely omitted. It has come out clearly, by positive and abundant evidence, that the principal conception and part of a plot to infect our cities and camps was not only entertained and perfected, but put in execution. Blackburn, with a Southern physician named Dunlap, a Canadian conspirator, went to the Bermudas and sent thence to an agent named Hyams, in Halifax, Nova Scotia, a number of trunks containing rebel clothing from yellow fever subjects, and with every stage, guide post and milestone, from Halifax to Boston, with yellow fever hospitals and patients, which were smuggled into the United States by the latter, and sold by another for a trifle, or, as the witness explained, "as a present for the ladies," in Washington, Norfolk, Newberne and elsewhere. About the same time, or shortly after, the yellow fever did break out in Bermuda—how far as the consequence of the attempt at infection it is, of course, impossible to say.

The evidence, which is far too long to be reproduced, and less reproduced, also shows that this plan of Blackburn was not only known to Clay, Thompson, Cleary and others, alleged to be implicated in the scheme of assassinating the President, but that these rebel agents and conspirators furnished advice and money towards carrying it out. Cleary, who was the bearer of Clay and Thompson's despatches, admits they both knew the scheme. They do not appear to have fully believed that the yellow fever was infectious, but they were willing to risk the experiment, and his associates to make the attempt to carry the pestilence not alone into the armies of the Union, but among the Northern population, and to fill our cemeteries with the corpses of our women and children. Thompson furnished more or less money for the purpose. His checks on the Bank of Montreal, where he had at one time a deposit of more than $200,000 to be used in the rebel interest, are positively proven to. In fact, the evidence of the guilt of Blackburn, the principal in the premises, is so clear and absolute, that even a Canadian judge can find no excuse or pretext for discharging him from custody. In some States whether there is any statute under which he can be convicted, inasmuch as it will be difficult, we may say impossible, to prove that any one died through his instrumentality or connivance.

Like the plot to burn New York, this scheme of infection seems to have been a failure; our city was not burned, nor were our armies smitten down by the "pestilence that walketh at noonday." But the guilt of the conception is none the less strongly inferred plans, which so contravert the humanities of the age, and carry us back to the depths of barbarism, and to the days when the dark ages, and to the days when the dark ages, if we may coin a word, the crime of individual assassination becomes one of minor magnitude, and it is simply ridiculous affectation and hypocrisy on the part of the promoters and abettors of schemes so diabolically atrocious, to slander and clasp their hands over their foreheads in horror at the murder of the President. The men who paid Blackburn and his subordinates, who supplied Beale, Kennedy, Burley, and the St. Albans robbers and murderers with means, besides assigning them their work in the first instance—these men make a most despicable exhibition of themselves, and gain no credit for their cant or bravery by denying acquaintanceship or complicity with Booth, who was by far their best educated, ablest, and most daring instrument—a man morally no worse than themselves.

In view of the atrocities of these men, the proportions of which we see slowly and almost unwillingly coming to comprehend, we may well credit the allegation that the terrible mortality of Union prisoners of war, in the Southern prison-pens, was the result of a deliberate purpose, and that our men were murdered not alone through wilful and unnecessary exposure in unhealthy localities, and through insufficient food and clothing, but through means more direct. The number of strongly constituted men who have survived the horrors of their captivity, but have come back to us in a condition of idiocy, starks a horrible suspicion of the employment by the rebel authorities of means to destroy them, or to render their return to the field impossible, which it is the duty of Government to investigate. After what we now know we cannot be expected to regard any act of theirs impossible. The more heinous and inhuman, the more probable.

"It is Finished!"

THE Secretary of War announces the surrender of the last organized force of the rebellion, in the following official dispatch:

"A dispatch from Gen. Canby, dated at New Orleans, May 26th, states that arrangements for the surrender of the Rebel trans-forces in the Trans-Mississippi Department have been completed. They include the men and material of the army and navy."

The authority of the United States is now completely re-established throughout the entire country. The rebellion is dead; the great Civil War is over. Peace has returned again to bless the land.

The rebel ram Stonewall was given up on the 11th of May to the authorities of Cuba, in Havana, and will probably be surrendered to the United States on demand. The only remaining rebel cruiser on the ocean is the "Shenandoah," but heard of in the East Indies.

We are pleased to see, and our satisfaction, we are sure, will be shared by all right-thinking men in the country, that President Johnson has decided to accept a pair of splendid horses and a corresponding carriage, offered to him as a present by a number of the so-called "merchant princes" of New York. The species of obnoxious disloyalism—that of swindling officers of the Government—has become very prevalent, and we are glad to see it discouraged by one whose position makes him the "first man of the nation." In the salaries of public men, at the present time and matured talents to the service of the country, are generally too small. Most of them have risen from the early years of the Republic, when, there is no exaggeration in saying, one dollar was relatively more valuable, as a purchasing medium, than three dollars are now. Our Secretaries of State, War, Navy, etc., absolutely receive less salary than is paid to hundreds of men in the city which they have to keep up with the representatives of foreign Governments. Our President is inadequately paid, considering the expenses of his position, and his $25,000 a year looks wonderfully, we had almost said proudly diminutive in comparison with the princely revenues which the Emperor of Austrian adventurer in Mexico has decreed himself and his family. The purely and solely services of which may possibly repay the weekly returns of the Custom-house in New York! But if Congress and the Government are opposed on the principal ones, for the minor ones are rather over than under paid—are not adequately remunerated, and there is no sin to be found in any salary supplied through the means of "round-robins," too often, and with too much reason, supposed to represent a process necessary to candor. Such tokens of appreciation or evidences of generosity would come with more propriety after the retirement of the recipient from public life. Those who have held high and honorable position, and devoted the best years of their lives to the public service, and who, in the days of dangers in their old age, or be subjected to the inconveniences and humiliations of cramped resources, when their services to the country are evident in every man's mind, and when there is no reason to suppose any retired public man of substance will be called to fill a like honorable position, there there can be no objection to the bestowal of some "testimonial," which shall help to make his declining years easy, and enable him to prosecute some scheme of common good. But no man in office should receive presents. Such gratuities are but an indirect method to save your, save expenses. If national niggardness will not permit him to keep a carriage of his own, let him walk, or pay his fare in a street car. If his salary be really too small to enable him to live like a gentleman, let it be increased. We do not like to see the American President made an implied, if not a real object of charity, by a set of snobs in New York or elsewhere, who boast of their wealth, and care not to ascertain by consideration, except through the open columns of their greasy dollars. They have been contriving, but not the less effectively, snubbed by the President, and we hope the lesson may not be lost on them. Their desire for notoriety, and probably the best regardless of the motives which actuated them in bothering the President, is, no doubt, as well gratified by his refusal as by his acceptance. They boast of the acceptance of their "mark of consideration." Their names—have they not been published in all the daily papers? Is there an attitude of immortality, or pinnacle of glory beyond? Possibly, but doubtful!

Among the sensation reports of the day, having no foundation in fact, is the story of the attempt of the negro troops in Memphis to massacre the paroled rebel prisoners in that city, in retaliation for the Fort Pillow massacre. The account, I appears, was manufactured from whole cloth with no conceivable object except to create anxiety against negro soldiers, and apprehension in the public mind as to future disorders. Nothing chafes domestic traitors and foreign enemies so much as the sudden return of the United States to order and the conditions of peace. The fact gives the lie to all their gloomy prognostications, and annoys them. Of similar origin, if not with precisely the same purpose, is the story that Jeff. Davis is not only in duress but has been roughly and wantonly placed in irons. This story, like that of the negro conspiracy, is utterly without foundation. Both will obtain currency in the press of Europe, but the contradiction will never be given. We have learned to expect no better treatment, and shall live down calumny as well as armed assault.

A CANADIAN gentleman, who is an ardent annexationist, exclaimed on receiving the news of the surrender of Lee's army, "Now, then, Canada will be annexed to the United States, and share in the glories of the regenerated and disenthralled Republic." A refugee rebel officer standing by, replied: "Go slow, my friend; it is very easy to get into the Union, but it's d——d hard to get out."

MR. JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, who wrote a life of Napoleon for the purpose seemingly of proving that the great object of his career was the establishment of Sunday schools, has come out lately in an explanation of the reason for his championship of that imperial philanthropist. Napoleon, according to Abbott, was the great foe of aristocratic usurpation. Abbott is going to prove next that Toombs was an original abolitionist.

THE New York Herald has a plan for paying off the national debt, so as to get rid of the present stupendous and costly machinery for collecting the internal revenue. It affirms that it can be done before the first of July next, in this wise: Let 150,000 persons contribute $20,000 each for the purpose, making the round sum of $3,000,000,000. The Herald pledges itself to take two shares, or $40,000, and thinks it will make money by the operation, as it now pays at least that amount in taxes direct and indirect. It thinks the Astors would take 20 shares, and intimates that the Vanderbilts, Laws, Stewarts, &c., to say nothing of sundry contractors, could afford to take at least 20 each.

AN attempt was made to assassinate President Jackson on the 30th of February, 1835, while the President and Cabinet were passing from the rotunda of the Capitol, in the funeral procession of ex-Congressman Warren R. Davis, a person stepped from the crowd, levelled a pistol at a distance of eight feet, and fired twice at the President. Fortunately, the pistol missed fire each time. The man was immediately arrested. Upon examination, it appeared that he was a house-painter out of employment, by name Richard Lawrence. As it appeared evident that the man was insane, he was never brought to trial. Benton considered this an instance of a diseased mind acted upon by a general outcry against a public man. Lawrence had read that the general financial distress, at this time, was caused by President Jackson, and therefore considered that by putting an end to the President's life he would restore prosperity to the land, and gain employment for himself. This was the only case of attempted assassination in this country up to April last, when the murderer's pistol was employed once more against a President, and this time with fatal effect.

MR. C. C. CLAY, JR., formerly Senator from Alabama, and lately one of the rebel agents in Canada, on hearing of the reward of $25,000 for his apprehension, as party to or privy of the murder of President Lincoln, wrote May 10 to the U. S. General commanding in Macon, Ga., saying; "Conscious of my innocence, unwilling even to fly from justice, and confident of my entire vindication from so foul an imputation upon the full, fair and impartial trial which I expect to receive, I shall go as soon as practicable to Macon, to deliver myself up to your custody." He delivered himself up accordingly, and is now confined at Fortress Monroe. Discharged on the indictment of subornation to murder, he may nevertheless be arrested and tried for the crime of treason.

WE reprint the following advertisements from the Augusta S. C. Sentinel, of May 2d, as probably the last of their kind that will ever disgrace the columns of an American newspaper:

"TAKEN UP NEGRO.—Boy Jim, dark complexion, about sixteen years of age, and says that he is a free boy, and was brought from Greensboro', N. C., by a soldier whose name was Caully; any body owning such a boy can have him by paying expenses and proving property. The boy can be found at the residence of W. P. Tanford, nine miles from Augusta, near the Washington road.

"ONE HUNDRED NEGROES WANTED.—I will pay a liberal price for any number of likely negroes—such as boys, girls, and a few men and families."

On the 6th of May the same paper published an article from which we subjoin an extract. Need we add that meanwhile Augusta had been occupied by the Federal troops:

"We are now living under the Constitution of the United States. That is the Government of the country. This is the fact we must all admit whether agreeable or not to our feelings. This is a fact which cannot be controverted.

"There is only one course then left for every sensible man to pursue. The course is a plain one. It is simply to support the Government under which we live. If any man has come or does come to the conclusion that he cannot live under the Government of the United States, the remedy for his imagined grievances can be easily applied. He can leave the country for a more congenial clime. If he does not wish to conform to the laws of the land, let him go to a land whose laws he prefers to obey. If dissatisfied persons will do this promptly, truly it can be said of them that 'they left their country for their country's good.'

* * * "Our people ought now to be fully convinced that it is folly, yea more, that it is madness for any one to suppose that the United States Government can be successfully resisted by force of arms. It formerly had equals. But now it stands at the head of nations—the greatest and most formidable of any earthly power. Its resources have not been impaired in the least by the late gigantic war—they are inexhaustible. In short, as a Government, it is stronger now, and has a firmer position than when the late lamentable struggle was inaugurated."

THE great woe that has fallen on the South is thus described by a clergyman there, in the Church Journal:

"We accept our destiny. Whether right or wrong, we are powerless to resist. Our agriculture is utterly broken up; our estates are ruined; many hundreds of our oldest and proudest mansions are in ashes; our people are homeless in the land of their birth; hundreds of our rural churches have been burned; the same has been the fate of a great number of school-houses and court-houses. There is no description that can fully convey to you an idea of the destruction to our mills, foundries, railroads and canals. Our forests have been levelled and consumed; our fields are without laborers; our towns and cities are without trade; our people are without employment or the means of support; our children are growing up without education; our wives and maidens are sick with watchings by the bedside of the dying and mourning by the graves of the dead; and thousands of our young men are either in exile or prison."

OUR readers will pardon the iteration and reiteration of that paragraph from President Lincoln's last inaugural address, which sounds so much like an extract from the sermon on the Mount, and which will live and command the admiration of mankind so long as the world endures:

"With malice towards none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphans, and to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

WHATEVER may be alleged against the legislation of the late General Assembly of this State in other respects, it must be admitted it did a good thing in enacting a law to prevent the defacement of the natural scenery of the State by advertisers and bill-posters. The law is now in effect, and we subjoin its essential provisions for the information of our readers, in the hope that they will all exert themselves to see that the penalties are enforced against all offenders. Massachusetts and New Hampshire have the same or a similar law. It has been suggested that hotel proprietors in our summer and rural resorts should see that all the disgusting and other advertisements that disfigure the scenery around them be removed before summer travel commences. Railway companies, especially the Hudson River company, cannot spend a couple of thousand dollars better than in scrubbing off the painted advertisements from the rocks that border their road—more especially that part of it between Sing Sing and Poughkeepsie. The law on this subject is as follows:

"SECTION 1. Any person who shall maliciously or wantonly injure or deface any monument or work of art, building, fence or other structure; or destroy or injure any ornamental tree, shrub or plant, whether situated on any private ground, or on any street, public place, public or private way or cemetery; or who shall paint or print upon, or in any other manner place upon or affix to any stone or rock, not a part of a building, or upon or to any bridge or tree, any word, letter, character or device, stating, referring to or advertising, or intended to state, refer to or advertise the sale or manufacture of any property or article, profession, business, exhibition, amusement, or place of amusement or other thing: and any person who shall directly or indirectly cause any such act to be done, or shall aid therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and, upon conviction, for each and every such offence be punished by a fine not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine or imprisonment. Every such person shall, moreover, be liable, whether before or after conviction as aforesaid, to an action in favor of any person injured, or owning or possessing any land or premises upon which any such act has been done; in which action damages may be recovered of not less than five dollars, and, in addition to that sum, of not more than five times the amount of the actual damage sustained; provided, however, that nothing hereinbefore contained shall apply to any word, letter, character or device relating to any sale, manufacture, profession, business, exhibition or amusement held, carried on, or to take place within fifty rods of the place where such word, letter, character or device shall be painted, printed, placed or affixed, and which may be so painted, printed, placed or affixed upon the lands or premises owned or possessed by the person who shall have, by himself or by any other, painted, printed, placed or affixed the same.

THE wild and reckless system on which the petroleum business was conducted for the past year is giving way to legitimate operations. Gambling in lands and shares has almost entirely ceased. The business is entering on its second, and what will prove to be its most profitable stage. It is getting into the hands of men who mean work, and will prosecute it as offering a proper and lucrative employment of capital. "THE GLOBE PETROLEUM COMPANY," the prospectus of which we publish in another column, is among the first to enter the field under the new and more regular system of operations. It is composed of men who know no such word as "fail," and whose position before the world will justify public confidence. Small capitalists will find this company a safe and prudent administrator of their investments.

AMONG the most indefatigable collectors of what may be called the "Literature of the Rebellion," is Hon. John H. Bartlett, Secretary of State of Rhode Island, whose address is "Providence, R. I." Besides a documentary epitome of the war, cut from newspapers far and wide, Mr. Bartlett has formed a collection of more than 2,500 books and pamphlets, such as sermons, addresses, reports, &c., &c., of which he is now preparing a catalogue for publication. This announcement will interest all authors and publishers; and all authors of pamphlets upon judicial, political, financial, commercial and military topics; of sermons and speeches; of biographical sketches, &c., relating to the war, or which have been called forth by it, will do well to forward copies of the same to him, in order that he may give their full titles in the forthcoming "Literature of the Rebellion." The reports of benevolent societies, the objects of which appertain to the war, and eulogies or addresses on the death of President Lincoln, will also be acceptable and be properly noticed.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The rebel fleet in the Tombigbee river, consisting of 12 vessels, was surrendered to Commander Simpson, fleet captain of the West Gulf squadron, on the 9th of May. Two commodores and 150 other officers of the rebel navy surrendered with their vessels and were paroled.

—— President Johnson has issued a very important proclamation. It declares all ports of the United States, with the exception of those of Texas, open to foreign trade and commerce after July 1 next. All restrictions upon trade east of the Mississippi, with the exception of articles contraband of war, are removed after that date. The President having, in a former proclamation, declared that all enemies of the United States found in arms east of the Mississippi will be treated as guerrillas, possessing none of the rights of war, now declares that all so-called Confederate privateers will be treated after date of July 1 as pirates.

—— An instance of filial affection among the Piute Indians we find recorded in a Nevada paper: "Two young 'braves,' under the assurance of being hanged, propose to give five ponies to the authorities if they will allow their aged fathers to be hung in their place."

—— Pike's Opera House, at Cincinnati, is to be lighted with gas made from petroleum.

—— Seventy disabled and discharged soldiers are now employed as clerks, messengers, carriers, collectors, etc., in the New York Post-Office. The Collector has also given places to a number in the Custom House.

—— It is proposed that the authorities adopt the Confederate uniform as the garb to be worn by convicts in the different penitentiaries.

—— Ninety-three large boxes, packed with the papers of the late rebel Government, have been dispatched from Richmond to Washington.

—— A letter from Memphis states that in the month of March, 1840 colored children were connected with the schools in that city; that in the course of a few months 1,000 negroes had learned to read.

—— "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is played in Williamsburg by a company composed entirely of colored persons.

—— The Massachusetts Senate has passed a law imposing $50 fine for making discrimination on account of color in any inn, place of amusement, public conveyance or public meeting.

—— A citizen of Massachusetts has written to Washington suggesting that the gallows on which John Brown was hung should be secured and taken to Washington for future use.

—— It is commonly stated that the wife of Jeff. Davis is a daughter of the late President Taylor. This is not so. Miss Taylor became the first wife of Davis, but his present wife's maiden name was Verina Howell, said to be a grand-daughter of Gen. Howell, of New Jersey. Davis has three children now living by his second wife.

—— A large mechanical establishment in Springfield has already received orders for three cotton presses, to be sent to three different States in the South.

—— A colored woman in Marietta, Ohio, brought recently to her minister $5. It was the first money she had ever earned. She wanted it to begin a monument for Abraham Lincoln, she said, without whom she would have remained nothing but a slave.

—— A correspondent of the New York Evening Post says: "Some years ago it was quite the fashion to take the initials of any two or more names and twist them in such a way as to produce from them a meaning applicable to the times. With this excuse I offer the initials of our beloved martyr President and our President—A. L.: All Lenity; A. J.: All Justice."

—— The following is a comparative statement of the National Debt of the United States, at different times, since 1791:

January 1, 1791	$75,463,476 52
January 1, 1812	45,209,737 90
January 1, 1816	127,334,933 74
January 1, 1826	89,985,537 72
January 1, 1830	291,089 05
July 1, 1846	16,759,926 33
November 15, 1856	30,963,909 64
July 1, 1860	64,769,769 08
July 1, 1861	90,867,828 68
July 1, 1862	514,210,371 93
July 1, 1863	1,098,793,181 37
July 1, 1864	1,740,690,489 49
January 31, 1865	2,279,579,486 10

—— Fifty-five deserters from the draft were drummed out of camp at Augusta, Me., on Sunday, to the tune of the "Rogue's March," after receiving a dishonorable discharge.

—— Mr. Oliver Johnson has withdrawn from the editorship of the Anti-Slavery Standard, after a long and faithful service of twelve years. He says: "Thank God, the work of Abolitionists, so far as slavery is concerned, is done. Why run the mill after the grist is out? What if the Constitutional Amendment is not yet tied up in the official red tape? There is nothing that Abolitionists can do to make its ratification more certain. Society action is no more needful to this end than to ensure the vernal equinox or the next eclipse, or to make fire burn or water run down hill."

—— The Raleigh correspondent of the New York Tribune gives the following illustration of the immense wasting of Johnston's army in the late campaign, drawn from an inspection of muster-rolls:

The 46th North Carolina volunteers had 3 officers, 3 non-commissioned officers and 8 men—total, 14.

The 47th North Carolina volunteers had 2 officers, 3 non-commissioned officers and 3 men—total, 7.

The 48th North Carolina volunteers had 3 officers, 3 non-commissioned officers and 14 men—total, 20.

It required nine regiments of North Carolina troops to make a battalion of 61 officers and men.

The original number of these regiments was, maximum, 1,000 men each.

The muster-roll of the 2d North Carolina Reserves had indorsed upon it "18 men." This was scratched out and the word "boys" substituted for men. They were all squirrel-hunting boys.

Five regiments of North Carolina troops had only, footed up, 157 men, including brigade headquarters.

The 1st, 4th, 5th and 6th South Carolina cavalry, mustered, all told, 260 men.

—— The whole number of snow storms in Boston the past 22 years, is 644; depth of snow during the same period, 91 feet 9⅝ inches. The average number of snow storms during the same period (22 years), is a fraction over 29, and the average depth of snow for the same number of years is a fraction over four feet.

—— The following legal holidays were established by the last Legislature of this State: Any day recommended by the Governor or by the President as a day of fasting or thanksgiving; the 4th of July; the 25th day of December; the 1st day of January; the 22d of February.

—— A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette describes an interview with Roger A. Pryor at General Logan's headquarters in North Carolina. In the course of conversation, Pryor said: "We have been fairly whipped, and I think that such men in Lee's and Johnston's armies as do not lay down their arms and return at once to their duties as law-abiding citizens, should be treated as outlaws. For myself, I yield that the cause is hopeless, and Logan, if you will only leave me two old mules to work a few acres of land with, in part pay for those that Sheridan's men took from me, I will go back to the plough and my duty as a loyal citizen."

—— The Hon. Jere. Clemens, ex-United States Senator from Alabama, died at his residence at Huntsville, Ala., on the 21st of May. When the republic of Texas was involved in war with Mexico, he served as a lieutenant-colonel in the Texan army. Although elected to the Confederate Congress, he never took his seat. He was opposed to the ultra policy of Yancy and other leaders of the secession ranks. He took no part in the war, and there is reason to believe that he was a Union man. Mr. Clemens was the author of several novels, the best known of which are "Mustang Gray," and "Bernard Lyle."

—— The colored woman is still living at the Freedmen's village, upon the Arlington estate, who was whipped by Gen. Lee after the overseer had refused the job because he thought she did not deserve it.

—— Free soup, of an excellent quality, is daily dealt out to the citizens of Richmond by the United States Christian Commission.

—— Curiosity hunters are as destructive as locusts. Woe to the tree under which, the stoop on which, or the house in which, any memorable event of the late war has occurred. Everything within hailing distance will be—if it has not already been—gobbled up by these relentless hunters for relics. The tree under which Grant and Pemberton met near Vicksburg has been totally obliterated, even to the roots, by relic gatherers. The last illustration of the merciless character of these people is furnished by intelligence from North Carolina. A Mr. Bennett owned an unpretending cottage where Gens. Sherman and Johnston met to arrange the terms of capitulation of the rebel army. The table on which the memoranda was written has been cut to fragments, and is in the hands of the soldiers. The house will unquestionably be carried off piecemeal. After the cottage, fence and trees will go, and in due time there will be an excavation to mark the spot where the disappearing Bennett cottage now stands. Bennett's name will go into history, but his house and furniture will fill the cabinets of curiosity hunters.

—— The Daily Rebel, printed at Selma, Ala., rejoiced over the murder of the President and the assault on Mr. Seward. That rebel has since died, as our forces have occupied Selma.

—— We have now ten Territories waiting to be made States—they are Wyoming, Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nebraska, New Mexico, Utah and Washington.

—— Mrs. Surratt, who has become notorious in connection with the assassination of the President, is about 50 to 55 years old, though she does not appear to be over 45. She is large in form; very stout; has a keen gray eye; a resolute look; rather ugly; has light hair, and any man would set her down at once for a perfect virago.

—— Hiram Powers announces his intention of making a full length marble statue of Edward Everett, for whom he had the highest admiration.

—— Gov. Fenton has vetoed the Broadway Tunnel Railroad Bill.

—— The Hoboken races, held at the new racecourse, commenced on the Tuesday and lasted for three days. The attendance was very large and fashionable. John M. Francis, as superintendent, was very efficient.

—— The President has declined the present of a new carriage and horses, purchased by a number of New York citizens. He gives as a reason the objection he has to any official receiving favors from any person or persons.

—— Robert Dale Owen has received from one of our enterprising and successful publishing houses, and has accepted, a liberal offer to prepare and complete, within the next two years, a life of Abraham Lincoln, to be comprised in two duodecimo volumes of 500 pages each, for general circulation; a library edition also, in larger form, to be issued.

—— The number of trees and shrubs planted in the New York Central Park during the past year was 20,000; of which 8,370 were taken from the Park nurseries. Preference is given to young trees rather than to those of larger growth. The former are less liable to die from transplanting, and become better and stronger. The expense as well as the risk is less.

—— The brother and sister of the late lamented Major-Gen. John Sedgwick have presented to the State the battle sword of that gallant and honored officer.

—— An important treaty has just been concluded between our Government and the United States of Columbia, by which the latter grants to the United States in perpetuity the exclusive privilege of transporting military and naval stores over the Panama Railroad. England, France and Spain are shut out except in a commercial way. The United States Government alone has the right to use the line as a military road.

—— The following are the dates of the first 10 seceding States, and their order of secession. Would it not be well for them to make the day the anniversary on which they should return to the Union:

South Carolina seceded	Dec. 20, 1860
Mississippi	Jan. 9, 1861
Alabama	Jan. 11, 1861
Florida	Jan. 11, 1861
Georgia	Jan. 19, 1861
Louisiana	Jan. 26, 1861
Texas	Mch. 4, 1861
Virginia	Apr. 24, 1861
North Carolina	May 21, 1861
Tennessee	June 9, 1861

—— The Liverpool Post says that "J. Wilkes Booth was the first actor to whose Romeo Miss Bateman ever played Juliet, and so good was he in the part that Mr. Bateman had serious thoughts of engaging him for the jeune premier characters, and bringing him to England to act with Miss Bateman. Some little trifle interrupted this engagement, which, had it been carried out, might perhaps have prevented the execution of a feat by which one of the greatest men of the time has fallen a victim, and might have influenced the welfare of a hemisphere."

Obituary.—Mr. W. T. Pinckney, an old and well-known New Yorker, died on the 21st of May. He was a prominent member of the Board of Education, and one of the Ten Governors. He was also President of the Astor Fire Insurance Company, which position he held from the commencement.

Foreign.—The Earl of Lovelace, whose first wife was "Ada, sole daughter of my house and heart," has married a widow Jenkyns. Lovelace in youth was no doubt sentimental and romantic. In his age he probably goes for comfort and good nursing, however called.

—— In his speech at the meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society in New York, Mr. Garrison facetiously remarked: "Where is and what has become of Jeff. Davis? One hundred thousand dollars reward are offered for him, and the money will be paid. In my case it is different. Thirty years ago the State of Georgia offered $5,000 for me. When Sherman was making his march through Georgia I thought of going there and claiming the reward, but it occurred to me that I should have to take Confederate bonds, and so it would hardly pay expenses. Recently I was in Georgia, and not even a sixpence was offered for me."

—— It is said that no fewer than 252 persons are annually killed in London in the streets; a very large percentage of these suffer through the arrangements which compel people to cross crowded thoroughfares at the risk of their limbs and lives. Mike Walsh used to say that it required more sense to keep out of the way of the omnibusses in the city than to be Justice of the Peace in the country.

—— In 1856 Sir George Cornwall Lewis wrote thus of the assault of Brooks upon Sumner: "People here speak of the outrage on Sumner as a proof of the brutal manners of the Americans and their low morality. To me it seems the first blow in a civil war. It betokens the advent of a state of things in which political differences cannot be settled by argument, and can only be settled by force."

—— The Pall Mall Gazette has been so often confiscated, at Paris, that it has nicknamed Napoleon "The Imperial Seizer."

—— The Phare de la Loire, of Nantes, France, which appeared in mourning when it published the news of Mr Lincoln's murder, now suggests that a penny subscription should be collected for the purpose of presenting to Mrs. Lincoln a gold medal.

THE GRAND REVIEW AT WASHINGTON, D. C., MAY 23—HEADQUARTERS OF GEN. AUGER—SHERMAN'S BUMMERS AND FORAGERS PASSING.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, J. E. TAYLOR.

THE GRAND REVIEW.

ALEXANDER and Cyrus never gazed upon nobler armies or more heroic legions than those which passed through Washington during Tuesday and Wednesday, the 23d and 24th of May.

These returned from the field covered with the glory which appertains to those who fight for the rights of man and the estimable privileges belonging to freedom. The war through which they have fought, and in which they have so signally triumphed, was not a contest for supremacy and territory, but a contest for the maintenance of national integrity and the destruction of a rebellion against law, order, and the dictates of humanity.

On Tuesday the veterans of Gen. Meade's army, the Army of the Potomac, an army which has faced the most powerful force of the rebellion for four years, defeating it at Fair Oaks, Antietam and Gettysburg, and finally compelling its surrender at Appomattox Court-house, marched through the capital, their banners unrolled and their arms flashing in the light of victory.

The following day Sherman's splendid army passed in review before the President and Lieutenant-General, and the scores of thousands who had come from near and far to look upon a spectacle which will never again be recorded them. The sight was one to be remembered.

Logan and Howard, and Jefferson C. Davis, one of Sumter's gallant defenders, were there and shared with their Commander-in-Chief the honors of the hour. Wreaths and bouquets were showered upon them, while the noble men of the West, who followed their banners, were cheered and congratulated by the immense throngs upon the sidewalks.

The scene was one of extraordinary interest, and the veterans who had marched under Sherman from Chattanooga, via Atlanta, Savannah, Charleston, Columbia, Raleigh and Richmond, felt somewhat repaid for their toil, privations and tedious marches, in the enthusiastic welcome extended them by the people of Washington.

They deserved an ovation of no ordinary character, and they received such an one as will for ever remain green in their memories. The noble men of Sherman's glorious army will carry to their far western homes, in Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Missouri, Michigan, and Ohio, grateful remembrances of the day when they marched through the capitol of the nation, and were crowned with flowers and heard the publick words of welcome which greeted them on every hand.

GEN. AUGUR'S HEADQUARTERS.

In depicting the scene at Gen. Augur's headquarters, on Pennsylvania avenue, during the review, our Artist has chosen to represent the passage of some of Sherman's "bummers" and the indigenous fruits of the sacred Southern soil collected by their industry. Says the Herald: "The most notable feature of the late grand review at Washington was Gen. Sherman's moving base of supplies, his unique and amusing, but highly efficient division of foragers and bummers—those industrious gleaners of horses, mules, donkeys, cattle, flour, corn, potatoes, pigs, sheep, goats, turkeys, chickens, ducks and other 'unconsidered trifles' which supplied the fighting legions of Sherman on their marches through Georgia down to the sea, and thence through the Carolinas to the fallen capital of the defunct Southern Confederacy. The ludicrous grand division of foragers and bummers furnished a life-like picture of an army of invasion carrying the terrors of the law into the wilds of rebellious States."

MAY people in perfect health, who have never abused their constitutions, be said to be "no better than they should be?"

THE SONG ON THE SEA-SHORE.

BY A. ALPHONSO DAYTON.

'Tis twilight's purple shafts
Spread o'er the shadowy sky,
The sea is moaning restlessly,
And phantom clouds flit by.
The soft-winged zephyrs sighing,
While shadows thickly lying,
Bedim the starlit sky.

I stand upon the shore
Beside the darkling bay,
And gaze upon its restless flood
The wavelets, loitering play.
The waters softly gleaming,
Methinks are gently dreaming
Of other days.

Hark! on the perfum'd breeze
Floats out a trembling song;
The echoes ring melodiously,
The soft strains waft along.
They float along upon the tide,
And die upon the other side
In trembling waves.

The mellow song has ceased,
But still its echo rings;
My thoughts go back to other days,
And memory round them clings.
Those days when love was dreaming,
When youthful skies were gleaming
With stars of hope.

Alas! those stars have set
Beneath the clouds of woe,
And dark despair is swooping down
To hide the sunset's glow.
My heart grows faint and weary,
My path looks dark and dreary
Where'er I go.

Adèb Brudois, Magician.

BY H. L. ABBEY.

CHAPTER I.

It is a city near the sea. From the high hills which surround the broad and level valley, it is impossible to distinguish the line of the shore and waters, save when the wind comes up angrily, and tosses the spray in glittering whiteness far along the coast. Then the waves clutch ineffectually, and with void fingers, at the town. Nestled in safety it lies, sleeping with its spires like a warrior with his spears. The stars come out, gather above the hills, pass on with the night, and make way for the dawn. This comes with its songs of a thousand birds, its fresh free air sweet as liberty, and the city's sounds of awakening life, with the main bells throbbing their iron hearts with joy.

Where the shore plunges into the sea like a doughty swimmer, wrecks have been strewn by the giant winds, and now when the tide slinks away, on the bare bosom of the coast loom up decaying hulks, strange with their sad suggestions. At twilight to creep away from the town, with its clamor and trade and life, to stand on the shore with the cool breeze allaying the thirst-like heat, and watch the shadowy and but dimly seen wrecks, causes them to take new shapes, and be peopled again. Vague forms whose spirit inhabitants have long since passed beyond the verge of a mightier sea than this, rise up and re-enact the scenes of long ago. The wrecks are vast ships again, cargoed with costly barter, products of loom and field, and doubly precious with their freight of beings. The sails bulge out like great eyes of fear, staring at the beacon that has just been passed. Mather's phantom ship of the Magnalia Christi is not more real than this. The vessel is like a soul which having yielded to crime, is now driven before it, and no more heeds the ruin to which it is tending. The night covers before the tempest. The mighty sea is thundering along the strand like the tramp of an invading army. Its banners are liquid darkness, and the storm taunts them to the sky.

THE MEETING BETWEEN CARL AND REGNALD.

THE RESCUE OF THE BOY.

On such a night as this, many a year ago, a ship from a land unknown came ashore and went down in full view of the sea-side villagers, and all on board perished, save one child—a pretty boy, lashed to a spar. He could scarcely have been more than five years old. To those who rescued him the tongue he lisped was as unintelligible as the babble of water over stones. His costume was eastern, of bright colors, and rich with braids of golden texture. About his neck hung a pearl necklace from which depended a signet ring with a seal of onyx. In his belt had been secured a dagger, on whose fine and narrow blade an inscription was engraved similar to that on the ring. Strange waif from a wild gulf of ruin and despair! The ringlets clustered about his face, with no mother any more to part them back and kiss the sun-tinged forehead. From the lips, and the head high and sloping with an imperious will, yet the eye was blue and clear like a glimpse of heaven between clouds, and the soul which looked forth loved by nature all beautiful things. And the boy grew. The lithe form became sinewy and strong. The brow broadened, and with it the spirit within. Not many years before our own tongue was mastered, and at last so engrafted that the mother language seemed to him the speech of some far-off world, some star he might once have inhabited. While yet a child great minds of the past spoke to him in tools with their noblest thoughts. He held communion with them, pondered their truths, and whatever pointed to daily life compared with his own. But in the supernatural and mysterious was his chief delight. Tomes of magic were sought out and devoured. All things strange enchanted him. For this reason he grappled with mysteries from which so many less ambitious would shrink. He became a painter that the secret of art might be understood. He puzzled over tricks of legerdemain, and withal longed for the golden secret of the alchemist. In such a variety of pursuits it is not remarkable that he did not make himself notorious in any. But who will say he possessed no genius? That power, that effluxus is too often made synonymous with success. The boy artist did not know that he was his own foe, for all that he had no care. The pleasure he derived from one day's study of heraldry, and in subsequently blazoning on delicate cards some semi-symbolic insignia—a splash ron on a shield, topped with two arched knights with enfolded spears, under the cum of which ran the old motto, Deus Amidet et Nos, and over all, "Isabel Vane," was at that time an ample matter to explore and from the attainment of renown would have been. The little lady could undoubtedly be charmed with the device, and would she not give a kingdom that he who had wrought it so cunningly? Promise and Reluctation. The logic was certainly good. Archbishop Trench would have done no better under the circumstances. So it was plain there was another secret the boy-scholar, with his poetic nature as his it must surely mean life or despair. Nor had he always read works that carefully aside would learn of for him. An old volume of Boccacio was well thumbed. Shakespeare he loved, and fancied he saw something of himself in "Hamlet" and "Othello," more than in the "Lear" of "Manfred" and Goethe's "Faust" seemed his own ideals. Keats' "Eve of St. Agnes" he knew by heart, and would gladly dispose of one of his arms for "Hesperides." The effect of such knowledge on a precocious and sensitive disposition not interspersedly favorable to make him unhappy. Happily if they have not had time to become well grounded, Carl knew his right intuitively, and would battle for it if need be. So his practical, not represented promised antagonistic results; he might love Isabel Vane more deeply in silence, or his whole nature would be wrecked.

As for Carl's friends he was not particular though in a measure select. He chose such as were the best of the village, which did not impress any too favorably a certain free aristocratic odore, who in the main is not to be much complained of from what comes they will. No reason was to be assigned for this choice, save his quotation of Cesay, that it was better to be first in a Gallician village than last in Rome. Other but not human associates he had; a kobof and smaller scylds, who were attentive to his every whim, reasonably he, and another that he was wont to improve when it failed at command to rattle in a wild manner to amuse. His father also intervened between his friends and ideals. His body of the mountain was of Dutch. Land of mountain he called her, partly because to him she seemed so far above him, and partly from the fact that who she dwelt on the cold sea of blue, and of light splinter like broken gold against her mansion on the hill.

Thither often a smack he went to study the varying glow and shade in the valley and on the sea, and most his one embodied Rosalind Ideal (Carlyle) entertained and discovered. Here in Rome Isabel gave warm welcome to Carl; here she lounged, indolent as an Eastern princess, planned sports impossible in impossible spots, or dwarf, and herd, and flower, or in a more serious mood sympathized with him in admiration of the master and the sea. She gave him studies from her boudoir, furnished to faster his own dainty taste, and at all times was gracious to him. Here were coubles meet for a Sybarite. Draped about the stained glass oriel, curtains of the finest texture hung in rich folds, and the carpet was the silken summer of Shiraz. On the Parian mantel, but in rossier marble, the stalactite of a peering fairy lamp, whose strongly baleful light would be caught in some elm more opprobrious than that of the culprit Fay. A lamp of incense, which may kept odor sufficiently to fill the room with the bewildering sweetness, repressed a swelled and dumpy Esquimaux, on the verge of a huge cake of ice, and a polar bear, and the light of the sun was flame. The light flooded in, filtered in all prismatic colors, and was the sun itself like a garment woven by fairy fingers. When the casement opened, in the fields could be seen the scores scattering the, the town with its jaunty roofs, sail, further off, the broad sweep of the blue sea. From the garden arose the odor of early flowers, and with a call, and the tinkling hum of a dusky of bees. Over the muted hung one or two of Carl's own fancies.

In the former, upon a splendid charger, gaily caparisoned, a youth rode, clad in armor. His eyes are bent towards the battlements of a castle, high on a mountain, where all the day long expend wide to welcome him, and where one to whom he is pledged awaits his return. The castle crowns a beetling bridges, each upheld by a dwarf, and these form the hill towards whose crest the knight is now riding. It is the knight of the Red Cross.

Had Isabel known Carl's thoughts, she would have loaned the castle was his own as well as that the rocks were but difficulties he forced some dwarf of evil might throw down, and that she was the lady he desired was a seeing welcome to him from the hunnered battlements.

And so the days passed, glorious with dawn and dusk. Weeks, held together by God's golden links of the Sabbath, came and went; moons withered and grew, seasons hunkered or ended, and three years rolled away—three years of heart-awaiting to Carl and Isabel. In all this time, if his affection was other than Platonic, he never discovered it to her. Without she had promised to be his in a hundred pretty ways. They were together almost every day, she visiting his studio to praise some revived work, or greeting him at Epicrech, as she named her mountain home. The valley gossips nodded significantly over their provorbial hen-scape, and relished the idea with each delectable sip, only quoting the pious and somewhat ancient proverb, that such studies, though taught out of Satan's lexicon, were manufactured above. Had they known on what a volcano their hopes were resting they would not have wasted for them to be made a second Herculaneum. For with the Spring, who, like a zephyr displacing his wraps, opened her May shrine of the valley, a strange face to Epricrech, a cousin of Isabel. Immediately Carl hastily hated him, though perhaps the dislike may have been partly due to their mode of introduction. Carl had been hunting nearly all day without any success, and, sitting down, had leaned against a great monarch of the woods to rest or dream, when suddenly a fine gray squirrel dashed before him. At the same moment appeared the near report of a rifle, and a bullet, that seemed as though hilleted, grazed his forehead with a most prescindent, but by no means slight scratch. Of course the diamonded individual who had unwittingly done the deed, apologized; he hoped the gentleman's pardon for his mistake in the excitement of the moment he had not observed him; he trusted he was not seriously hurt. Carl answered the hurried with his usual, but believing in first impressions, made up his mind at once. Keith Rendon, as he called himself, was away the low droops of blood that had trickled over his cheek, he saw his gentleman inspecting him from head to foot with a critical, half-amused look, and his own face also, long hair that clustered about it forehead not too high, where the perceptive faculty than the reasoning, and a slight moustache—slip with a deep brown moustache, clear cut features, handsome as Apollos, and without a sunny glance which had been so pleasing in the boy, but was now cold and calculating. Rising up, the two parted, Carl plunging still further down the glen, starting a whole herd of coloured with its dark, and Keith Rendon pointing aside in another direction the briery network that opposed his path.

The shooting affrayment again found Carl absent from his studio, and wandering towards the mountains. Not finding Isabel at home, he strolled to Epricrech, where he found her in the garden. The pure green grass, matted warm the terrace steps and the walks, and the trees, the flowers, the rather a pet deer grazed; a marble statue of Juno stood sentinel at granite steps which led gentle to the sea, and a Corinthian temple, open to the land, a bust of Venus a voluptuary would adore, arose from the trunk of a stainless sea of flowers. Venerable as ages, the oaks and elms put forth fresh dress in their white blossoms. The vagabond singers, the birds, kept up a ceaseless symphony—Isabel and Carl were in Paradise. Nobody are they, with a hundred others, trombador and band. There, near an oried balustrade of heavy woodwork, were a man and a lady, the latter sitting on the top of a growing cedar. If Valhalla is in the branches of the Tree of Existence, this vine is the branches of the golden bough of Virgil. Here looms a fanciful statue of Triptolemus, whom Ceres sent to all the world to teach the art of tillage and of planting in furrows; and there, bending over a stream, which issues from a concealed grotto to flow in a graceful silver curve, for over watching the image that the water, as it passes, grows more beautiful in portraying.

Among the lovely flowers Carl lounged. He bent over them and caressed them. They possessed to him a vague sweet sense, which though not sadness, was not joy. Then he looked at him, with perfumed voices, the nature of that one solemn feeling, but failed. We know there are other senses than the five which connect the soul to creatures of a higher existence—senses that we perhaps may have in the life, after we shall have cast off the mortal which confines us. Carl was not possible, because they are so lovely, that the flowers knew he was not human, and were in a sense that we have not, and can but blindly understand.

Carl closed the garden gate behind him and recrossed his steps down the mountain. There, in a wayward mood, wishing the world might afford another adventure, and that he might himself be a participate, he fancied the day itself a mighty warrior battling with the night, and now its great wrath, the sun, had slain the foe, and was dead darkness, and under the shock was staggering backward, wounded and falling to the ground. But the ghost of the foe, the night, fled, and night the fields of Error. Carl saw the streets of red lamps and swinging signs, they veins where the blood of traffic coursed-fed. The boys had there played and pranks with his hair and soothed his troubled brain. Then he walked on, where the mountain a stream purled and gurgled an inarticulate prayer, like a pilgrim that wounds after a long journey in sight of his native village. Then a little stream a bridge ran, and as the wall Carl paused to look down into the clear water. Soon he found the stream was a river, and the bridge was and her cousin dashed past. Both seemed too lost in some pleasure to regard him. A gang stabbed at his heart in pain. Instead of this he dreamed that Isabel could treat him coolly, or that at any time would ever come when they would part. How the thought spread him. He walked on blindly, past the suburbs of the town, and entered a small hillside cemetery. Here he lighted on a tree which had been laid on a table he saw on the floor, swept off by some one who had passed. His mind was turned more than his light, and he threw under, whoever it had been, might see the painting lit up by the sunset. Though quaint in conception, and somewhat grotesque, the subject was Antony and Cleopatra.

A group of pure white water-lilies lay on the clear surface of a crystal stream. No natural water more limpid and shadowy; no natural lilies more real. In the foremost lily-barge, a fairy Titania, shading herself with a red-rosed, sailed and leaned languidly back on her downy couch. Upon the bank opposite, stood Oberon, now Antony, with all his pride, his great love Egyptian queen.

Carl laid down upon his lounge, and hurled his face in his hands. For a time he seemed lost in moody abstraction, but at last, rising up, paced his apartment to and fro. On a corner whatshelf a row of books like a row of kings in purple and gold looked down from their common throne. A small treasure of the world of Art and of Letters lured into any position balanced itself on the edge of his mantel. In a close case at another side of the room, were unbroken plaids and bits of metal.

"The fire beneath the crucible was out.

"Carl Rendon, you are a coward!" he cried, throwing that Carl devoted his thoughts at time to other things than painting. Near the alembic stood a dark-colored, and he started the moment he saw what was upon it. A silver-hilted dagger, scarcely broader than a heavy needle, yet long, and of the finest Damascene temper, formed a spear in a central square. In an instant he was reading the alchemist written words:

"Carl,—My liege lord and master to be, Reginald Booth, demands that I avow you from the books of my remembrance, and renounce you for ever. I obey. May your own folly of the valley grow as loyal to you. This dagger—your gift—I return.

ISABEL.

Carl felt that he was deeply wronged. A blind passion seized him, and for the time he was driven by a fiend. Isabel was false. All that was beautiful in his nature in that hour was transformed. The angel of light became the angel of darkness. He opened a little drawer in the stand with the dagger, and took an oath alone and with the night for a witness, that as in the past he had never consented a deadly wrong, so in the future he would not, though it, ever act should be devoted to the most malicious evil. While he thus to himself make love to his affections, he regret crawled from his chair and rattled its length across the table. As near as he could, Carl destroyed everything in his studio. Not a picture was spared. The glasses were broken, and their contents scattered. Paintings which at most him labor and thought he cut and defaced. Then, with a firm but deliberate the square ring, and the sudden, he went out into the twilight. Where he went, no one knew, but after a number of days his name was placed upon the coast, and though it was impossible to identify the body, it was believed it Carl. It was buried near the shore, and his name was placed above it on a slab of marble. And the wind came up out of the sea and moaned about the cliffs, the breakers dowed it with their tears, and the white gulls, like spirits hovering over, spread their wings in the night. And the years passed on till at last the dust of the body and shore were one.

CHAPTER II.

TWENTY years had changed a thriving town to a city. Twenty years had covered the grave by which he was usually grass, and written its name in ashes on the little headstone. Long ago Reginald Booth had led Isabel to the altar, a not unwilling bride, and Carl's unfinished—had been given them, and for four sweet years her presence decored them, but in the night she had been stolen, a night of storm and rain, and there ever after a night of tears and loss.

After the belief of other days. Possessing, as did Reginald Booth, a large and various domestication, life had not been as smiling as the summer see her dreams had pictured. Much further down in the social scale was he than she would have supposed her ideal could ever be, and her old fancies in her heart, going up and down, were as sad shadows of the night morning and never to be realized. Yet the latter thoughts often came a vague desire, and but half expressed, to wonder if Carl once more, for she felt, she knew not why, that he was not dead, and yet refused to believe it plain away the apparent wrong he had done her. Or late she had gone down into the city and into some obscure shop to buy some trifle, and there Almost as it was left. The building being uninteranded, no one seemed to heed it. He owner was absent, and Carl's promises in the form of pictures of litigation had ensued. Premention whispered to Isabel that here Carl would yet again come. But the table where the work of the dagger remained, she fastened a note—a few words—which she left there, that in the hand that wrote them had stabbed into the wood years before. They ran thus:

"Isabel,—In a little while I lead to the alter one for life's love of ever valley. I shall not see you as I promised to-day, because I am to commence her portrait, which is a wedding gift.

After this visit to the studio, she crossed the bridge on her way to Epricrech, where she had been absent almost the last three days, and she wondered if he, too, like these days, had really passed away, and if it was indeed he who had left her so peculiarly in the cold grave by the coast of the sea.

While now the summer season was at its height, and the fashionable world concerned, was on opportunity for the people of the city to witness the pageantry of Arch Pendleton. The placards stated the day, and, as usual, the house at Arabian, and the feats were acknowledged to be most wonderful. When the time for the show transpired, the large theatre was filled to overflowing.

The curtain rose and revealed only the stage, from which every vestige had been removed, except the magician appeared, dressed in Eastern costume. From beneath the folds of his turban the long white hair escaped, and fell about his shoulders. His form was tall and erect; the eye sharp and piercing, and his step like one accustomed to command. He walked to the centre of the stage and made a low bow to the assembly; then drawing a plaid from his pocket, about half made a circle of it on the ground—a dark green plaid. This was touched with a heated taper, and suddenly he was surrounded with a ring of flame that exhaled the most delicious incense, filling the entire hall with its odor. No Lotus more potent. The whole audience became obedient to the will of the magician. What he would have them see, or fancy they saw, became real to them as any event of every-day life. The ring of flame slowly arose, a circular cone, like a thread of silver. It passed above the height of the magician, but he stood unharmed. When the flame flickered and went out against the ceiling, he came in unceremoniously from a door back of the stage.

His flowing sleeves were confined by the shoulders, displaying his dark, brawny arms. In his hand he held the seed of an orange. He raised it up, commanding the concentration, and the orange-seed burst from it. A tub of earth was brought in, from which the seed was placed. Gradually the germ grew before the eyes of the people, until it had become a tree. Bud petaled and fruit followed, ripening in luscious profusion from the branches. Plucking his hands full, the juggler stood on the verge of the stage and tossed the oranges to the children in front.

At the silver tinkle of a bell came another form upon the stage, a beautiful girl of perhaps eighteen summers. Her arms and shoulders were of marvelous where the long black curls clustered. The robe of crimson satin fell scarcely to the ankles, revealing and half concealing the symmetry of a perfect form. She made no sign to the audience, but walked to the tree, and stood upon one of its lower branches. Then, by the motion, drawing a pistol from his robe, passed to the opposite side of the stage, and, taking deliberate aim, fired at the girl, with an armed ball directly at her heart. There was a prolonged shriek. She raised an arm, and, catching the bullet, placed her chin. The branch of the tree alone detained her from falling. In the whole audience rose to secure the murderer. He waved the pistol with a smile for a reply, turned upon it. The eyes were translated with a strong expression, yet the lips were parted, and she spoke:

"It is night. I see an artist in his room. He is walking to and fro. He grasps a letter from the table. He kneels before it. He tears it and as if making a vow. He goes out into the street.

I see a man followed by the sea. He sees some man at the door of a fisherman's hut. He talks with this fisherman. They bargained to exchange clothing.

"I see a great ship far off. The artist, in the dress of a fisherman, is going towards the vessel with a skiff. A storm is coming on the skies.

"It is night again, and a street. The wind is blowing. Some of the shutters of the houses whistle. A man is walking slowly along. He stops his cloak about him. It is the fisherman in the dress of the artist. There is some one approaching. There are two men. They are following the fisherman. They run up behind him suddenly. They seize him by the throat, and are clubbing him. He is down. He struggles violently. Murder! He is dead.

"I see a carriage driving towards the seat in coach. I can hear them talk. I hear the words: 'Only a Booth shall inherit Eyrieerock.'

"The coach door is shut. Once more I see the eyes fixed, from the moment the curtain rose, on the magician; and when the girl appeared he started, and from that moment his eyes never left her, only the most intense interest. As each sentence was spoken, he trembled violently. His face became pale with dismay and anger. Over the back of the forward seat as he leaned, his hand was clenched, and when the last words had been spoken, he shrieked out: "It's a lie!" and fell back and fainted away. Quietly he was restored; and with the conclusion of the momentary disturbance, resumed:

"I see the great desert, and the sky. There is a caravan, and among the camels a man riding along with their thinking bells. The artist is with them. I see him drinking water from a leathern bag. I see him eating a piece of coarse sausage. They are Bedouins. They have attacked the caravan. In the fight the artist is struck down. He has taken a bundle like a pack from his back. He draws from the belt a dagger, from the finger a ring, and holds them in a necklace. He is examining the inscriptions on each. He shows them to his companions. They kneel uncover their heads, and kiss the ring and the dagger. They are trying to restore it. It is raised upon a horse in front of the chief. The Bedouins have gone.

"I see a city. There are a thousand streets. A palace, fronted by a lake enclosed in a vast cup of rock. I see a great square of the city. The concourse of people surround the building. I see the crowns within. The young man wounded in the fight with the Bedouins is upon a throne. He is made king. A marquer and driven his mother, while he was in prison. Another enters stealthily, and with a dagger. It is the dagger of the—"

In an instant the magician dashed the liquid to the floor. The girl looked up wonderingly into his eyes as if awakening from a trance. The deathly silence seemed to oppress him. He raised his hand, and suddenly burst forth the flute-like notes of a choir of voices, filling the air with strains of the most delicious melody. More lovely the music than that sung by the voices in the little church on whose steps Margaret knelt in the opera of Faust. While the magician hand was raised the symphony continued, but when it fell it ceased. Then he bowed kindly again to the audience, and the dark curtain descended amid a storm of applause.

When the rose of dawn flowered in the east the following morning, it lit the windows of Eyriecroft, and shone in on the face of one who lay with white lips and closed eyes, never more to waken. The servants, rushing in, found over his heart a single drop of blood, where an instrument had pierced—a dagger, perhaps, long and almost as fine as a needle. On the breast was a solitary white hair, and at once the magician was remembered. He, in the night, had fled, no one knew whither, and with him Isabel. She had passed the room where lay her murdered husband.

"They glide, like phantoms, into the wide hall!
Like phantoms to the iron porch they glide,
Where lay the porter, in uneasy sprawl,
With a huge empty flagon by his side;
The wakeful bloodhound rose, and shook his hide,
But his sagacious eye an inmate owns;
By one, and one, the bolts full easy slide—
The chains lie silent on the footworn stones;
The key turns, and the door upon its hinges groans."

The forged note, years before so artfully used by Reginald Booth, was gone from the little table in the deserted studio.

For a time the town was alive with stories of the mysterious tragedy; but after a little while rumor found other subjects to employ her busy tongue, and the people who figured in this strange drama were forgotten.

Only the mansion stands for a monument of what has been. It is untenanted, and desolation is about the place. Rank weeds choke up the once luxuriant garden growths, and the swallows and bats make the eaves populous. A vague horror clings to the house, and the simpler folk of the valley, as they pass, whisper their supernatural fancies of its wide halls, and the room in which the murder was committed. The spiders have spun their webs across the panes, and a noisome vine has reached up its long skeleton fingers to obscure the light. But as of old the sunset strikes against the window, and as of old the dew falls, and the white stars come out and hold their vigils over the valley and the sea.

What thereafter became of Carl, Isabel and her daughter, matters little to us. For even if they lived, rulers of a tribe or numbers of Bedouin tribes, ere this their dust is buried in the hot sands of the desert, and the great Simoons sweep over them. The Arabian, eagerly listening, with his ear bent close to the lips of the Sphinx, waits no more vainly for speech, than we at the lips of oblivion.

THE Atlantic Monthly and Our Young Folks are so firmly established in the consideration of the public that it seems needless to praise them. The Atlantic is the periodical to which every one now applies for the reception of the brightest passing ideas of the day, and the soundest political and intellectual teaching. The essays, stories, etc., of the June number are fully up to the difficult standard which Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have set for themselves. Our Young Folks is peculiarly happy in leading up the youthful intellect towards a healthy maturity of taste and opinion.

MESSRS. APPLETON have brought out a careful copy of the Emperor's "Vie de Jules César," in French. It is in different bindings, from pamphlet form up, and leaves nothing to be desired for beauty and correctness. The acknowledged perfection of the Imperial author's literary style renders this, in some respects, a capital text book.

MR. SUMNER, of Park Row, whose sufferings in the rebel prisons of Texas we illustrated last year, has published an engraving, on tinted paper of the popular photograph of President Lincoln reading the Bible to his little son Tad. This touching home picture cannot fail to have a large sale.

PETROLEUM.

ONE of the latest reported sayings of our lamented President was addressed to Senator Colfax, who was on the eve of departure for California: "Don't forget to tell them all, Colfax, now that peace has come, what I said to you about developments," or words to that effect. The sagacious mind of Mr. Lincoln, endowed, perhaps, with something of prophetic spirit as his great task drew near to its close and his reward was at hand, foresaw clearly in what direction the returning industry of the country would most profitably flow; already, to his view, the great pageant now displayed in Washington, was past. The bronzed veterans were dismissed, with the thanks and homage of a grateful country, and as they streamed homewards, Northward and Westward, to the towns, hamlets and hill-sides from which they had sprung, he foresaw wisely the kind of labor which would be the most attractive to them and most useful to the country. For, beyond a doubt, the excitement of mind and body which for many dreary months past had been led by camp life, and all its various incidents, till it had become almost a second nature, would calm down to the monotony of peace more easily when engaged in mining, with all its varied features, than when brought down at once to the drudgery and routine of farm life.

But a more important consideration even than this was no doubt present in the mind of the good President. He knew, no one better, that Providence had so blessed these United States, that not alone whenever on its varied surface the farmer drove his plough, a bounteous harvest rewarded his labor, but, also, that beneath that surface, there lay the wealth of empires waiting only to be gathered in.

For years past all have been familiar with the details of Jones' Silver Mining and the history of that wonderful country beyond the Rocky Mountains with its strange forms of regulation, and its vast, and almost inexhaustible deserts. Yet, dazzled with the ceaseless flow of mineral wealth from California, (obtained with so much risk and so many privations), how few of us, two years ago, imagined that within a few hours' journey from this city there lay literally fountains of wealth, rivalling the products of the gold diggings in their money value, while far exceeding them in the ease with which they could be wrought, to say nothing of the comforts of civilization which do not require to be transported to the scene of labor, for they are already there.

On the one hand you undertake a long and costly journey, and after that the field of your explorations lies in deserts far away from your fellow-man, where even your food must be transported for hundreds of miles. You toil painfully on a ledge of rock, and the fragments you dig out must undergo many processes before you know whether or not your labor has been in vain.

On the other hand, you step into the rail cars at Jersey City—and within 24 hours you are at the scene of your labor. Underneath your feet lies the wealth you seek, you bore downwards, it may be a hundred feet, or it may be more, but when you have pierced deep enough, out gushes the hidden treasure, which, as it comes to the surface, hundreds of people are waiting to carry away, and give you greenbacks in exchange. Meanwhile, in the intervals of work, you have lived with all the luxuries of life around you, and if your health, or courage should fail you, you are within easy reach of your family and friends.

It is no wonder, then, that petroleum developments are outstripping all other mineral enterprises, and we propose, in our next number, to lay briefly before our readers still stronger reasons that exist, why these rightfully take the precedence.

TOWN GOSSIP.

THE scheme proposed by Mr. James Gordon Bennett, to lift the national debt by dividing it among the monied men of America, has met with considerable success, the subscriptions up to last Monday approaching two million dollars. It is but a few days since the plan was ventilated in the Herald, and Com. Vanderbilt, on hearing of it instantly retorted "Put me down for five hundred thousand dollars!" the neatest repartee, as we said at the time, ever recorded in history. These Crœsuses have the brains to perceive that, by advancing by a few years' time their immense taxation, they gain divers solid advantages—one of the most obvious of which is the saving of the salaries of tax-officers and all the machinery of that beastly collection business. As for us, in our cosy corner here, we see the financial giants at their Titanic game, and, half-dazzled at the magnitude of the thing, just find breath to ejaculate a shaky "hear, hear!" as we have seen diminutive clowns at the circus running round after gigantic horses, and breathlessly doing the applause while the monsters attend to the work.

It seems, by the last Inspector's Report, that we are paying considerably more than $800,000 a-year for our ash-carts and our dust carts, for dumping the ashes and freighting the ashes, for sweepers and bellmen, and, above all, for the services of those gentlemen of a censorious and critical turn of mind, who review the works of the other litter-ateurs, and are handsomely feed for their "inspecting." Meantime the cleaning is not at all obvious, and one thinks with a sigh of the foreign cities that are well kept by speculators who find enough in their sweepings to enable them to pay a considerable revenue to the municipality, instead of citizens being taxed to support the men of litters and their critics.

A Frenchman has established himself in front of the Maison Dorée with a quantity of small vehicles—just room for two in each. You engage one, introduce the soul's adored to her seat, with infinite attention, or allow the placens uxor to help herself; the attentive driver arranges her skirts, or your own if you happen to be in mourning for Jefferson Davis, and fastens the door; and so away you go, to the Park, to the ferry, or shopping up and down Broadway, hours and hours. Every 60 minutes the proprietor earns a dollar; and you have all the consciousness of aristocracy at a very small comparative expense. A dollar an hour, or half a dollar to the Battery, is such a reasonable and delicate appeal to your purse, that the amour propre of that most sensitive human organ is not wounded in the least; the driver is happy, for he is strongly discouraged, by the prospect of dismissal, from intriguing for extra fees—so that the most distracting labor of the cabmanly intellect is lifted from it, and his mind disports peacefully in healthful speculations. That the dear one at your side is suited, needs no demonstration; and the imagination wanders in vain to discover any party to the ingenious arrangement whom it does not bless with unfancied comforts, until it lights upon the large and recusant body of cabmen of the old regime, who with one will and an extraordinary number of theological terms, assert that the brilliant Gallic idea is a shameful foreign swindle, and an outrage upon all the honest men who earn their bread by the sweat of their horses.

Now the fact is, these gentry have conducted themselves with such an overweening sense of their own intrinsic loveliness and the abject reliance of the public upon their generous and merciful qualities, that their constituency had begun to feel the least bit tired of the game, and to pine for a change. These decent little one-seat carriages are, if we may so express ourself, the coming man. Everybody has been longing for something, with vague internal desires, yet ignorant of the precise shape in which the deliverer was to appear; and every soul, at sight of the pretty little carriages drawn up along Union Square, has felt that this now is the embodied dream of years, and exclaimed gladly, "Oh, my prophetic soul, my hansoms."

The widow of ex-President Tyler, it seems, has had her peaceful retreat at Staten Island outraged by a party of over-ardent young patriots, who darted frantically into her parlor, where some children were playing alone, and bore off a small decorative tricolor, which they supposed to be a representation of the now faded-out colors of the Confederacy. The points are, that the ornament was not a rebel flag, and that the invaders got upon Mrs. Tyler's cushions with their boots. Both these mistakes the lady has been ventilating at great length, in typographical shrieks both long and piercing, all through the daily press; and the outrage has passed from the domains of martyrdom to those of boredom. Mob-law is in every instance to be deprecated, but it occurs to us that the wife of an ex-functionary who died under such a doubtful cloud as covered the later career of Mr. Tyler, would be wise to hold the privileges of her grief in silence, or at least be appeased by the published retractation of Gen. Dix.

At the Olympic Theatre the ever-young Mrs. John Wood continues her successful drama and spectacle, "The Sleeping Beauty in the Wood." This brilliant extravaganza has now run about 40 nights, without any abatement of success. There are such immense quantities of theatre-goers to whom the attractions of graceful dancing, fine tableaux and Gustave Doré scenery are paramount attractions, that the sylvan Mrs. John is secure of her audience for a long time to come.

Another spectacle has been inaugurated at the Broadway Theatre—the audacious "Seven Daughters of Satan," under the direction of handsome Mr. J. E. McDonough. The action includes a Zouave exercise by a score of youthful Graces, in full costume and perfect drill, and a representation of storming the earthworks before Richmond.

Mr. Wallack, at his own beautiful house, announces his "last nine nights"—a statement which is almost able to turn the fine old comedies he produces into tragedy. On Saturday next the sensation will be the ingenious new drama entitled "Central Park."

Mr. Wheatley finds the attractions of the fair young Maggie Mitchell so powerful that he has permitted the exquisite drama of "Fanchon" to be prolonged through the present week, so for six nights more the fair round face and the blonde curls will shine as the Cricket, in the eyes of the delighted auditors. May their shadow never grow less. On June 6, Miss Mitchell will begin to play in the "Pearl of Savoy."

At the Circus—or, if you prefer a title which is all Greek to us, the Hippotheatron—the perennial Zanfretta still twinkles over her tightrope, but the one-legged dancer has got tired and sat down. Harlequin is born every night, in company with a very comical French clown, and the acrobatics, tricks, horses, &c., continue very well indeed.

An "uncontrollable public excitement" has been burning in Mr. Barnum's lecture-room (we have his own word for it.) The sublime showman produces a most romantic drama, called the "Heiress of the Hidden House," which is the immediate occasion of this popular frenzy: but the saltations of Mr. Denier, who dances as uniped or centipede at will, probably has a good deal to do with the enthusiasm.

At the Winter Garden, on Monday night, Miss Hosmer opened in "Camille." We have not yet seen her.

Bryant's Minstrels are having a splendid run, with the unapproachable comedian, Mr. Frank Moran. There has perhaps never been an Ethiopian farceur whose studies of African characters were so careful and felicitous; listening to Mr. Moran, the vital negro mind, in all its unique originality, simplicity, and precious transparence, along with the irresistible tricks of the face and tongue, are all understood in their inmost perfection, and a better feeling towards a whole race of kindly beings is the effect. A comic actor at whom even the philosophic Autocrat did not disdain to smile when he paused among the minstrels after his "Hunt for the Captain," may fairly claim a consideration for a higher class of auditory than are always to be found before the Knights of Cork.

On the day in which this paper will come before the public, a trotting match is to be held on the Union Course, L. I., for a purse and stake of $1,100, mile heats, in harness. A great field of first-class horses are to be brought together.

On the next day, at the Fashion Course, the first trot will come off for a purse of $1,000, George Wilkes entering Flora Temple.

WORDS, WORDS, WORDS.

SOME men talk little, and will not be forced to talk more. Others are perfect fountains of talk, it rushes out in an incessant stream. When once the fire-plug of their utterance is drawn, everything around is inundated, and there is no possibility of stopping it. You may wait for ever, dum defluat amnis, while the river is emptying itself. Such talk is necessarily desultory, touching upon all things, and something else besides. There are hosts who consider a supply of it useful: it has at least the advantage of allowing you to ponder your own private concerns.

In England this variety of talker is mostly a male; but Paris abounds with female specimens. Of one who has been photographed in print, Madame de S., the photographer says that the inside of her head is as muddled as the outside is smooth:

"A woman in gracefulness, a man in acquired information, a Parisienne in heedlessness and confusion of ideas, giddy and serious, frivolous and grave, clever and absurd, restless, capricious, this person is a perfect summary of the chaos and convulsive starts of the French political, social and literary world. She has long fits of silence; she listens. All at once she explodes like a bombshell. Her conversation is then a soliloquy. Follow the thread of her discourse, if you can; for her ideas are shuffled and shaken in her head, like the cards in a pack or the numbers in a loto bag:

"'Ah, here you are!' she says. 'You are come to-night. Much obliged; but I don't want you. You may go home again. Your last article was good for nothing. No, no; remain where you are. What a piece of business, the Pope's Encyclical! Monstrous! I have not read it; but our philosopher says that it is more improbable than Jack and the Beanstalk. German affairs are very entangled. Impossible to get a box at the Gymnase for another fortnight. They might as well have allowed the bishops to have their say. How do you like my dress? It was immensely admired at the Admiralty. At the Hotel Lambert it is thought that the Poles may make a struggle in spring. Mon Dieu, how badly your cravat is tied! You are aware that the comte loses three hundred thousand francs by the stockbroker who ran away last Thursday. The duchess believes Spain is ripe for revolution. That poor fellow's death gave me a good fit of crying. He was an immense ass, nevertheless. Once upon a time he wanted to marry me; I laughed so heartily that he left the house without his hat. He came to inquire for it a twelvemonth afterwards. I had given it to my coachman. Do you travel this summer? I do not; I have had enough of it. Baden-Baden is always the same. When shall we travel in balloons? Is Nadar really a man of genius? Here is my carte de visite which he took. How I am aged! Will you let me speak? I cannot get a word in. Politics are wearisome; everything is wearisome. I have half a mind to go into a convent. Do not suppose I am speaking seriously. I have been to five balls this week. The foreign minister's was a complete success. It seems the King of Portugal is very popular. I am glad to hear it; but it's all one to me. What a pity poor Flandrin is dead! I wanted him to paint my portrait. Will you take any tea? After all, it is not so easy to remain a widow as you fancy. I am very much courted. You don't believe it? Word of honor! It is hard to choose. I should have no objection to the baron. He is rich, and only forty. But he makes too much noise when he blows his nose; which is curious, as he is not fond of music. Do you know why Edgar left his wife? It is incomprehensible. They married only a couple of years ago, and adored each other. However, people cannot be always adoring. What a lovely country Italy is! Perhaps, rather too many brigands. You have never been assassinated? The sensation must be far from pleasant. You are as silent as a parrot in the sulks. Ah, Poetry! daughter of heaven, exiled on earth, without coat, coals, or candles. I should like to find a caravanserai for all those travellers in the land of dreams. Poets should be lodged and boarded in it, with the monthly supply of a golden lyre and a pair of boots. Confess, now, that you consider me a wonder, and say, 'Here's a perfectly senseless woman!' No such thing; only I don't like to talk of the same thing three minutes together. What makes revolutions? Ennui. Lamartine says so. Come and dine on Tuesday; and try and be a little brighter than you are to-night. And now I have a secret to tell you. It is half-past ten o'clock. Good-bye. If you see Madame Desfontaines, don't ask how her husband is. She takes no interest in his health, considering that he died a twelvemonth ago. Good-night. Stop. I have one thing more to say to you. Prices have risen enormously; and it is a great mistake to be plagued with servants.'"

Undoubtedly madame can talk; but it is not so self-evident that she can reason.

MANY would esteem it an act of vandalism to remove a well-known tree from the neighborhood of a dwelling. But, although we love the pleasant green trees as much as any one, observations made from time to time in various situations show that, in respect of health, a large quantity of foliage too close to a house is not desirable. In the first instance, it leads to dampness; the drip, without very careful drainage, saps the foundations; and, under the branches, long after the sun or wind has dried up the other surface, all remains dank, and in some seasons uncomfortable. The foliage also abstracts the light to a greater extent than at first may be supposed. Those accustomed to the apartments do not notice this so particularly; but strangers seldom fail to note the unusual dimness, even at mid-day. The leaves and boughs also stop the proper current of air, and prevent ventilation; and in autumn, if the dead leaves are not removed, there is the chance of a bad atmosphere, which has often been a cause of a sickness.

JEFF.

"Oh, contradictory Jeff!
A Paradox you remain;
Had your last Shift been Bootless
It had not been in vain."

"I say, old fellow, what do you think of Jeff. Davis in crinoline?"

"Think," replied Jones, "I think it is the last war-hoop of the rebellion!"

J. D.'s last "Great Combination"—Beauty and Boot-y.

When Mrs. Lot from Sodom fled,
She was ordered not to halt;
For looking back, and not a-head,
She became a pillar of salt!

With Nebuchadnezzar, that wicked king,
This evil came to pass;
With cows and oxen—fearful thing—
He was turned out "to grass!"

The traitor Jeff, with milder doom,
Though he deserved it less,
Was simply sent on a quick run,
Attired in woman's dress!

The women protest that Jeff. not only made gross political assumptions, but interfered finally with their vested rights, and degraded their honorable and ancient garb.

The run of J. D. in the vicinity of Irwinsville, Ga., so completely eclipses Bull Run, that we doubt whether of the latter we shall hereafter hear much, even from rebel sources.

"Go it, Boots," is one of the classical phrases belonging to the vocabulary of the street, the origin or meaning whereof we do not altogether comprehend. Since these pedal appendages have led to the detection and arrest of Davis, the phrase will possess additional significance.

The attention of a distinguished communicant, "late of Richmond," is invited to the last clause of the 22d verse of the 13th chapter of Jeremiah. The verse is as follows: "And if thou say in thine heart, Wherefore come these things upon me? For by the greatness of thine iniquity are thy skirts discovered, and thy heels made bare."

London papers note the disappearance of crinoline. It will become unpopular enough when the latest news from Dixie reaches Europe.

The next edition of the Confederate Geography will correct the location of "Davis's Straits," so that he who runs may read.

Jeff. Davis cannot figure as a military hero in history, but he has made his mark on a dress-parade.

Surely, if Davis had recalled his old experience at cards, he would have remembered that a Knave is known from a King by his boots.

Ancient warriors were accustomed to have armor-bearers, who followed them in their long marches. On the approach of danger the armor was adjusted to their persons. Jeff. Davis's wife seems to have acted in that capacity during the late travels of the rebel chief.

While one of the soldiers was searching Davis, his private secretary, Harrison, came up, and in a very indignant tone, said:

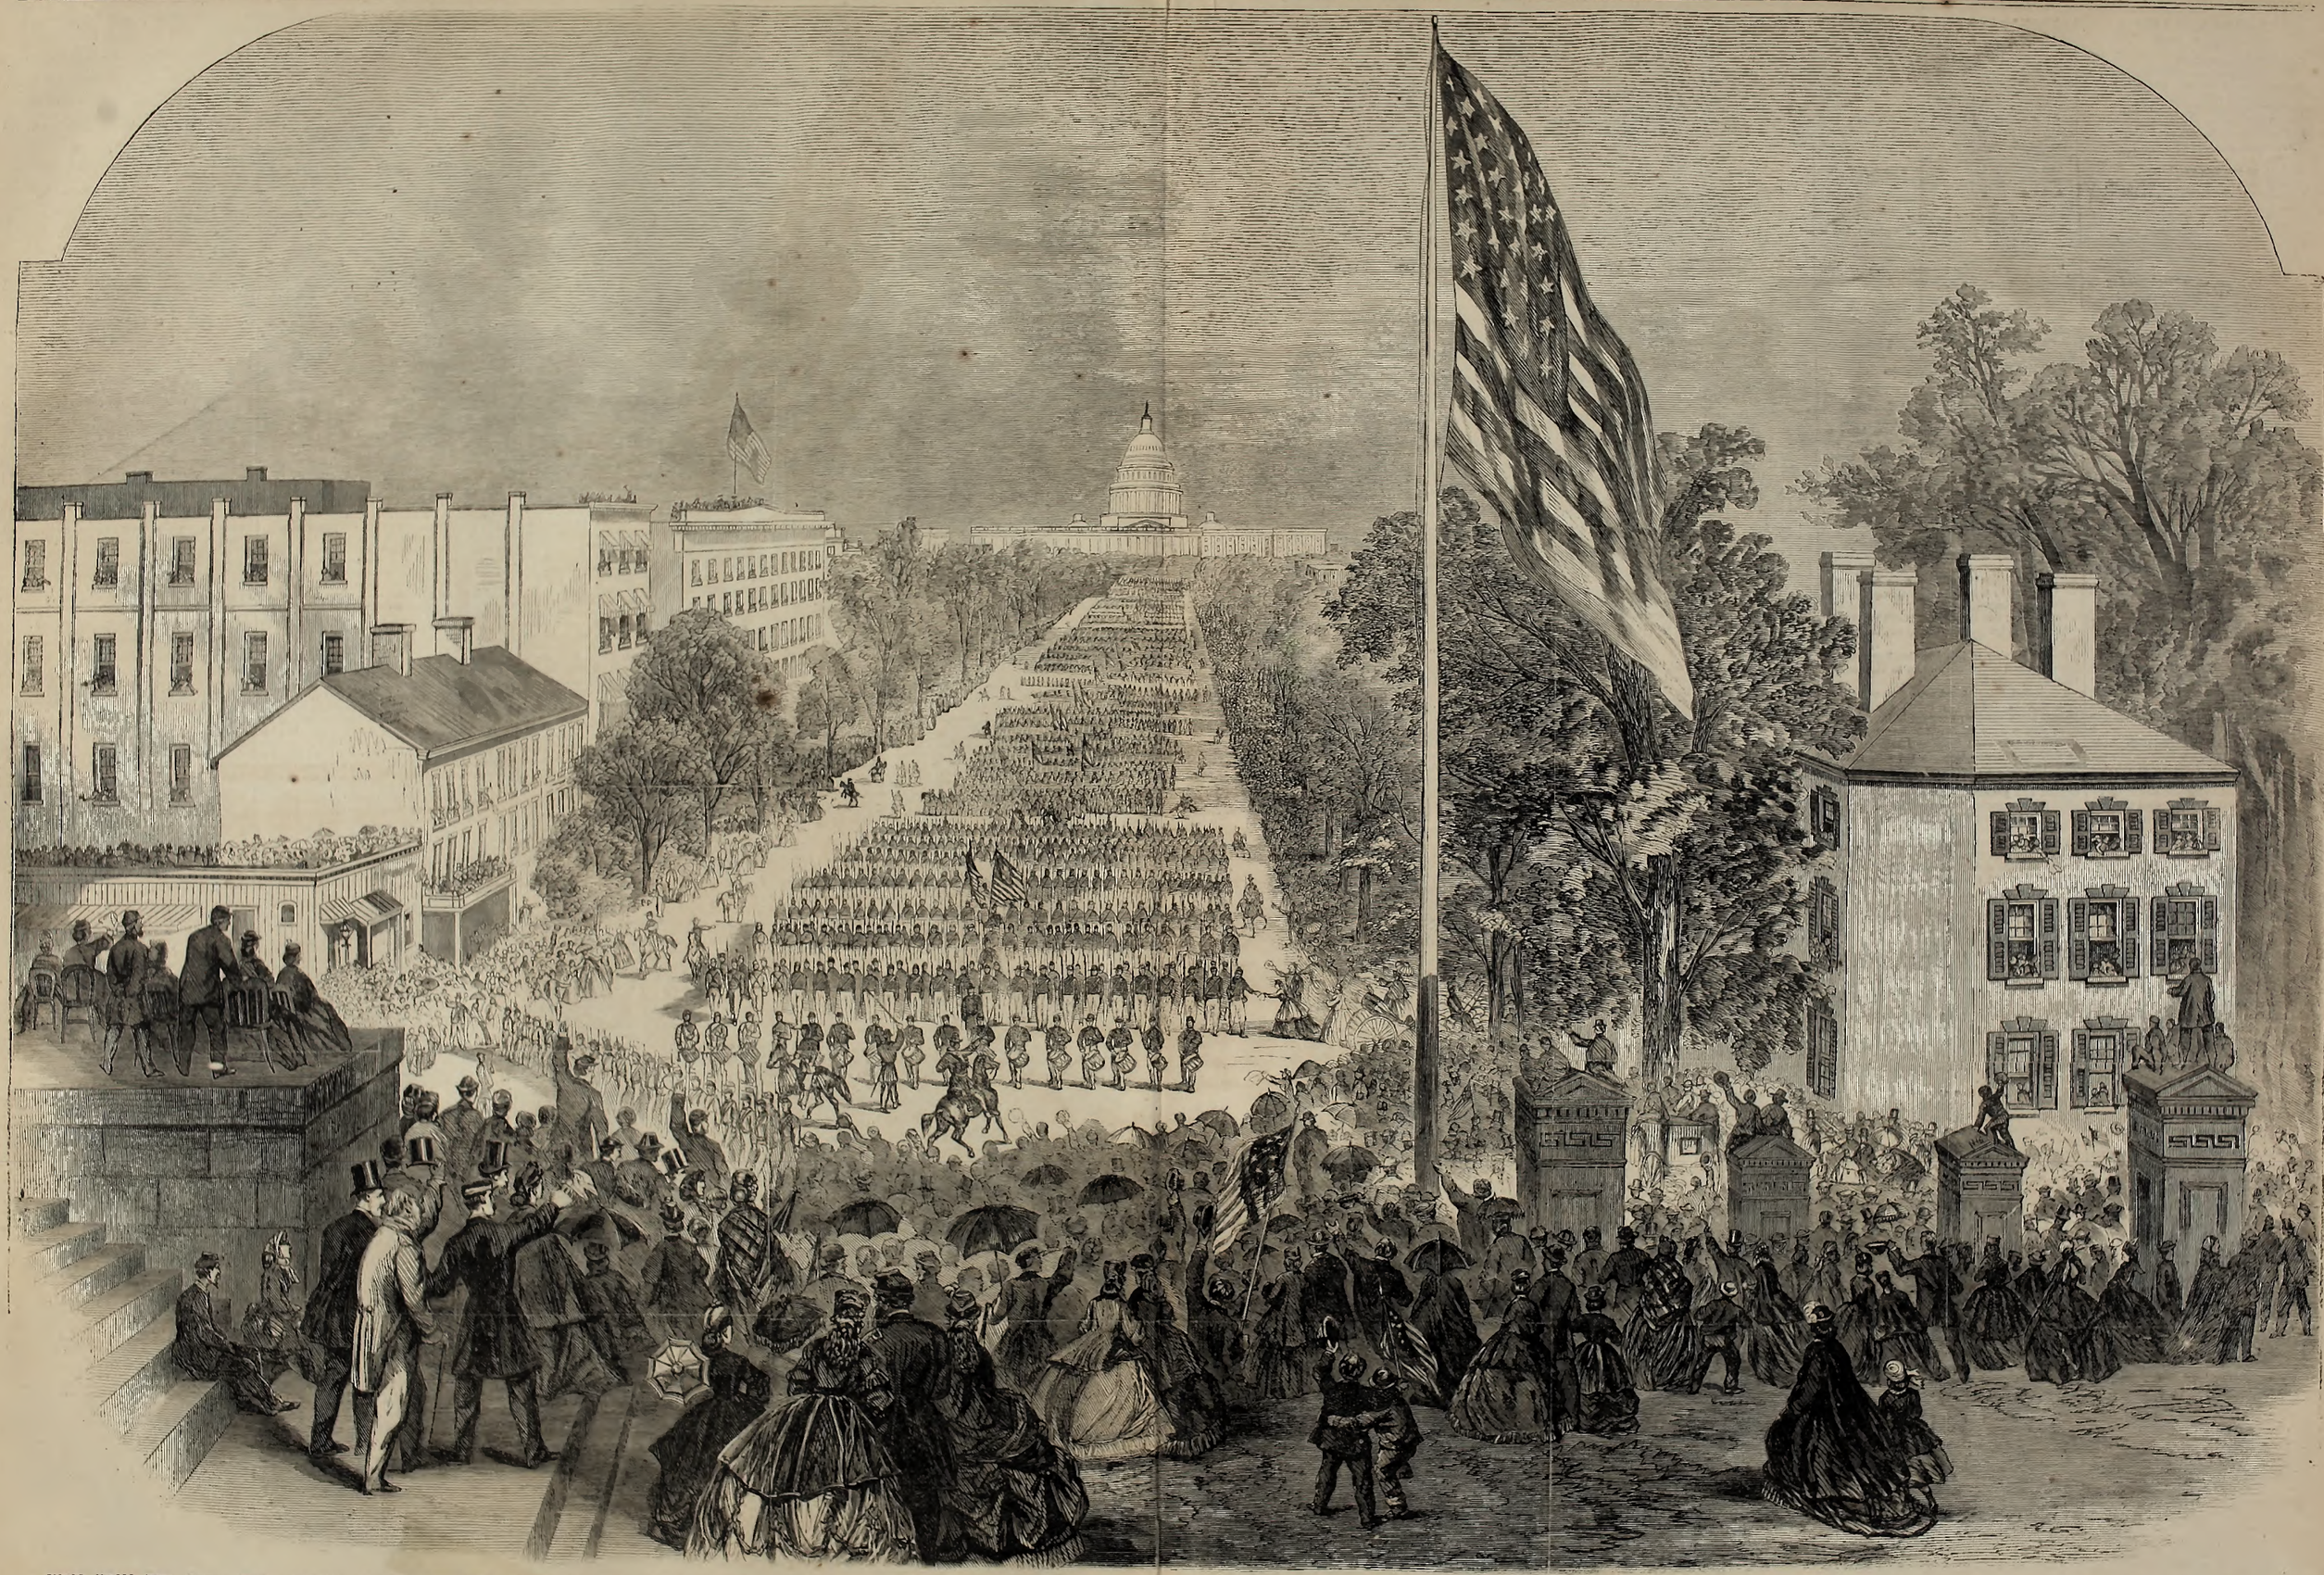
"Ain't you ashamed to treat our President so?"

"President—h——ll" said the soldier, "what's he President of?"

Under the title of "Davis in Texas," the New York Commercial Advertiser has the following: "The theory of the Daily News that Jeff. Davis has not been captured, but that a lay figure personating him was taken, is utterly overthrown by the statement officially made, that Jeff. was really captured in Texas. When found he was in Gal-vest-on.

The Hungarian Diet, when the Empress Maria Theresa implored their assistance, shouted: "We will die for our king—Maria Theresa." This confusion of the sexes may have another historic illustration; and we should not be surprised if the Texas Legislature, with that chivalrous feeling for women which distinguishes all knightly spirits, should cry out: "We will die for our Queen—Jefferson Davis."

Was Jeff. promoted when he left the regular line for the crinoline?



"Et arma cedunt togæ,"
Said a Roman of renown—
"When the din of war is over
Arms yield unto the gown!"

But this motto Jeff reverses;
For, arrayed in female charms,
When the din of war is over,
In his gown he yields to arms!

THE FIRST NEWSPAPER.—The first published newspaper bears the date of Nuremberg, 1457; the first English one was in 1622; and the first French in 1631. A very ancient printed sheet was offered for sale in the Libri collection, and of which a duplicate exists in the British Museum. It is entitled, Neue Zeitung, aus Hispahan und Italien ("News from Spain and Italy"), and bears the date of February, 1534. The catalogue gave the following description of it: "An exceedingly rare journal, which appears to have been printed at Nuremberg. It contains the first announcement of the discovery of Peru, and has remained unknown to all the bibliographists that we have been able to consult. In this printed sheet it is said that the Governor of Panumyra (Panama) in the Indies, wrote to his majesty (Charles V.) that a vessel had arrived from Peru, with a letter from the Regent, Francisco Piscara (Pizarro), announcing that he had taken possession of the country; that with about 200 Spaniards, infantry and cavalry, he had repaired to the possessions of a great seignor named Cassiko (who refused peace), and attacked him, that the Spaniards were the victors, and that he had seized upon 5,000 castillanos (gold pieces), and of 20,000 silver marks, and lastly, that he had obtained 2,000,000 in gold from the said Cassiko."

JOHN RANDOLPH, of Roanoke, was the strongest leader that the radicals of Virginia ever had. He was the warrior who prepared the way for the formation of a new school of politics under Mr. Calhoun. He was a small, dark man, with a beardless face, and an intensely black eye. He was proud of his descent from Pocahontas, and his Indian blood was easily discernable. His voice had a very peculiar ringing quality, which gave the listener the feeling that the fine weapon which he used was twisted around after entering his antagonist. He did not use the tomahawk, but the finest of rapiers. He was remorseless in his sarcasms, and was ready to stand by them in the field. He was not bad-hearted, however. In a duel with Henry Clay, he received Mr. Clay's fire and then discharged his own pistol in the air, exclaiming: "I would not make a widow and orphans for all the Ohio and its tributaries." His caustic and witty sayings were reported throughout the country, like those of Dr. Johnson, as when a writhing antagonist meeting him full on the main avenue at Washington, said: "I do not give the way to puppies." "I do, sir," said Randolph, yielding the path and walking on. Many assertions have been circulated against Randolph's personal character, which are utterly unfounded. They are traceable in part to the hate he excited by his relentless attacks, but still more to his contempt for the ignorant and fanatical sects by which he was surrounded. He has for many years served the religious fanatics of Virginia, as Voltaire has elsewhere, to point their exhortations, the allegation being that on his deathbed, when he could speak no longer, he wrote the word Remorse! It has since been proved that he simply wrote the name of a neighbor—R. E. Morse—whom he desired to see. Mr. Randolph was kind to his slaves while he lived, and liberated them at his death.

"MY character," said an alderman, who had cleared himself from a charge of jobbery, "my character, sir, is like my boots—all the brighter for blacking."

NATIONAL HYMN

BY GEORGE W. WEST.

Given of every perfect gift!
Before Thy throne we lend the knee,
And thankful for the past, we lift
Our hymns of solemn joy to Thee.
We offer praise—for Thou hast given
To us the freedom of our sires—
And brighter yet shall flash to Heaven
Devotion's thousand altar-fires!

To Thee we owe this goodly land,
Freed from the stern oppressor's rod,
And here we pour, with willing hand,
Our incense to our father's God!
Accept the grateful sacrifice,
Jehovah, in the hour of bliss,
While anthems ring and hymns arise
From many an humble shrine like this.

In glossier hues, when Freedom's ring
Was shrouded in Oppression's gale;
When darkly from each beetling crag,
Formed down the tyrant's wrath like hail,
Our father's locked to Thee for aid,
And dimly through the storm of war
Thy bow of promise was displayed,
Hope-bearing token from afar!

So God, then, be our praises poured,
Hymns of the heart to Thee we lift;
Worthy of Thee are not Thou, Lord!
Other of earth's offerings gift!
Songs of thanksgiving shall be Thine,
And altars for Thy worship set—
Wherever VICTORY hath a shrine—
Wherever FREEDOM lingers yet!

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE IRBON ST. JOHN.

AUTHOR OF "THE LAIRS OF RICHMOND HILL," "THE WORLD'S VERDICT," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.—CONTINUED.

Her husband, she said, had died abroad, and was buried in Milan; but soon after her arrival at Thornton Heath—her new residence—a carriage drove up to the door in the middle of the night—a decrepit man was helped from it, and hurried into the darkness.

This man was Sir Robert Arbuthnot, Lady Arbuthnot's husband, as he was supposed by the world—but in reality the husband of the one whom he had seen in terrible grief at Tavistock, and who had consigned to his care a child whom he could not care for—could not, because with the conflict of emotions which had left him, and he now no more with the light of reason.

For sixteen years Sir Robert Arbuthnot nothing more had been heard, immediately upon the madness of Sir Robert who had disappeared entirely.

Lady Arbuthnot's reason—I must call her for the present Lady Arbuthnot—was plain enough. If the Duchess could only make her appearance on the scene, and the Baronet recognised her, her own claims would be cast at once to the winds, and her son Arthur would be declared illegitimate and penniless.

So, although not possessing the courage to destroy him at once, she placed him in this lingering imprisonment, hoping every day might be his last, and that in his coffin might be buried with him the secret of her false position.

On this day—when I introduced Sir Robert to my readers—she had scarcely dared to possible that he would be alive, for the previous evening had seen him in the agony of a terrible disorder.

On this morning she had for the first time for many a long year hoped that he was living, and her hope was gratified.

He looked at her, as I have said, with a wistful glance as she entered.

"I feel cold and hungry, Anne," he said; "have you brought me food?"

She sat down and opened a parcel she had brought.

"Yes," she said; "I have some food and good wine for you; but I must get you to do something for me first."

"What is that?"

"You must sign this."

The Baronet grinned foolishly.

"What is the use? I am dead."

"Yes—yes. Never mind. Sign it, as I tell you."

She spread it out before him.

It was a copy of a document which had been partially destroyed.

It conveyed to Arthur—the illegitimate son—the entire property.

"I don't sign that!" cried the madman, peevishly. "That won't give me warmth, or light, or satisfy my hunger! Give me meat and wine!"

He rose, and approached that part of the table where the food was placed.

"Down—down!" cried Lady Arbuthnot, as if she were speaking to a dog. "If you refuse to sign, I will take the food away!"

Tears stood in the man's hollow eyes, and he growled down on the ground near his instructor.

"I will sign anything!" he whined out; "only give me a little food and light! "Don't you think, now, Anne—" don't you think that you could let me go out once, just to look round the garden, and see the flowers? I wouldn't be troublesome, and I won't stop long."

She did not answer.

She did not even hear him; for she was reading over the parchment, to see that all the clauses were right.

"Don't you think you could let me go out for a few minutes?" he persisted. "Where is the parchment? There! I will sign it! I will do anything for you, if you will let me go out into the fresh air again! You know, I've a deal of property coming to me some day, and you shall have it all —all; only let me out for a while—just for a while!"

"I cannot!" returned Lady Arbuthnot, hurriedly—"I cannot! After this long confinement, it would kill you. The doctors have told me so repeatedly. Come, sign this, and let me go."

The madman took the pen with a sigh, and prepared to sign the paper, as he was directed.

As he did so, a word in the manuscript caught his eye.

That word was "Holmsford."

It was merely the name of a place; but it seemed to bring back to his mind some strange reminiscence of the past.

"Helen—Helen!" he murmured, in a sad, low, plaintive voice, as his eyes wandered again over the parchment.

Then a flash of reason seemed to light up his face, and he looked keenly at his companion.

"Who is that Helen?" he asked, with savage earnestness upon the table exclaimed;

"Take the food away, if you like, I will not sign it."

Lady Arbuthnot turned sickly pale.

"Why not?" she asked.

But he would not reply.

He returned to his seat, and sat there moodily, with his head leaning on his hands.

Lady Arbuthnot looked at him for a moment, as gathering up the meat intended for him, she passed again to the door.

Then she paused, and smile, and locked the door carefully upon the wretched prisoner.

In her drawing-room her lawyer, Mr. F. A. Davis, was awaiting her—a man who seemed as if he would have made an affidavit to anything.

"Well, my lady," he said; "is it all correct?"

"Yes—he has refused!"

"Yes; he often has these obstinate fits."

"Which may last for a considerable time, I presume?"

"No; doubtless it will be gone to-morrow. Till then, Sir. F. A. Davit, we must be patient."

The lawyer bowed.

"Certainly; but the old mette still holds good —'put not off till to-morrow what can be done today.'"

On the evening of this day, Guy Raymond left, that he might be on board the boat to the hamlet well on Thornton Heath.

The dismal place looked more dark and dismal than ever in the fading light; the fir trees seemed more gloomy; the wind howled through them with a more mournful noise: the clouds seemed to take more weird and fantastic forms, as they were driven through the sky, rushing wildly on their way, the witches hurrying to keep their tryst by the dismal pool. Everything looked creaked and groaned with a most doleful sound, while the remnants of the rusty chain swung to and fro in the dreary sky, and made everything as if a legion of unseen demons were wheeling in a wild dance round the dread emblem of past cruelty and present fear.

Guy Raymond shuddered as he beheld the ugly spot which had the unpleasant sounds, as if they had a double significance for his excited spirit.

He paused to and fro with hurried, uneven steps; he seemed to be waiting for the arrival of some one, and yet appeared unwilling to wait.

At length the dull sound of a horse's hoofs was heard on the turf, and the forms of both horse and rider were seen looming darkly in the dusky light at the edge of the thornton brushwood which the German peasant so feare.

The rider stopped his headlong career as he reached the well, and, dismounting from his horse, led him to the gallows, to the huge upright post of which he securely fastened him.

Then he advanced to the spot where Guy Raymond stood waiting.

The newcomer was a man of middle age and height, with long black hair and whiskers, a face bronzed by exposure to the sun and wind, and eyes which glowed like live coals beneath his shaggy brows.

His dress consisted of trousers and coat of pilot cloth, and a sou'wester cap.

"Cool evening, Mr. Raymond," was the first salutation.

"Good evening, Captain Mellish. You are punctual"

"I generally am, sir."

"It is a good habit to acquire. But come, to business. What is this you have to tell me?"

"Simply that Richard Freshfield has arrived in England."

"In England?"

"Yes. He is now in Liverpool."

"You are not deceiving me, Captain? How do you know this?"

"I know it as a fact that he came home in my ship from Melbourne."

"Home at last!" muttered Guy.

He stepped a few paces upon each of his thighs in the hush, and has amassed a considerable sum of money."

"And what does he want in England? Why not stay where he has been so successful?" demanded Guy Raymond, fiercely.

"I know not, except that, from a conversation I overheard on the homeward voyage, he intends paying you a visit."

"Paying me a visit?"

"Yes. He was talking with one of the crew who knows this neighborhood, your name was mentioned, and he said that he should certainly make a point of seeing you when he reached England."

"Well, Captain, I thank you for the news you have brought me. Meet me at Devin's Hotel at two o'clock to-morrow."

The Captain departed, mounted his horse, and galloped away.

"Coming here, is he?" muttered Guy Raymond. "His coming must be prepared for, at all events."

So saying, he was about to return home, when a footstep was heard nearing him, and a loud, manly voice shouted:

"Who waits abroad so late?"

"A friend," answered Guy Raymond.

The childhood was quenched, and in a few moments the owner of Raymond's Park stood on Thornton Heath, face to face with his nephew Walter Raymond.

CHAPTER X.—JUST IN TIME.

WHETHER or not the meeting between Guy Raymond and his nephew Walter was a preconcerted one on the part of the latter, it is impossible to say. At any rate, he did not appear surprised.

"We are well met," he said. "This is an opportunity I have long sought."

Guy's face was very white, and his voice trembled as he answered:

"Let me pass! I want no speech with you."

But Walter, having once secured his mate, sat eyes, was determined exactly to let him escape.

"Stay!" he cried, intercepting him. "You cannot pass yet. I wish to speak to you, and I will."

For a moment Guy hesitated, as if doubting whether to attempt to force a passage or force his way. He decided on the former.

"I will remain," he said, in a firm voice; "but I warn you, Walter Raymond, that my patience is a useless one. I know all I desire to know, and nothing you can say can alter my conviction."

"Then I will speak," said Walter. "What I wish to understand is this: Can you suppose me sufficiently dastardly to have shot the coward's shot which shattered your right hand?"

"I can think so. I do. I do.

"Have I ever given you reason to believe so?"

"Yes."

"In what way?"

"You have thwarted me in every way. You have marshalled against my wishes—you have hourly lived near home, and squandered your money as you have lived upon grandeur, and made me a byword by your wanton and reckless."

"But this has nothing to do with the attempted murder. I am innocent of that?"

"I believe you are."

"Yet just now—"

"I spoke hastily. I said the actions were not too infamous an action for you to be guilty of; but I never gave you credit for the courage which was necessary for the undertaking. That is, in an act which would have suggested itself to you, but would never have been carried out. Is this all you wish to say?"

"No. Do you intend to persist in thus depriving me of every farthing which is my due?"

"I have left you the shilling."

"And that will—"

"Leaves all to Charlie Freshfield."

"What! Charlie Freshfield, the half-bred?"

Guy Raymond muttered an angry oath.

"If she is mad now, it will not always be so. At any rate, I will be his guardian, and shall inherit all."

"If my dead father were but here he would punish you for your impiety," cried Walter fiercely. "The money of which you are depriving me is my own. I have a right to everything of it—to me, and to take it from me is to rob me. Remember my word—your miser's sin will yet bring its curse upon you."

Guy Raymond made no reply.

"Are you not afraid?" said Walter, in a low tone.

"Afraid! Why should I be afraid, and of whom?"

"Afraid of the man you have robbed—of the man whom you are dragging down, step by step, become be indicted in one white—the marrying a woman for gold."

Guy laughed.

"Is that your game?" he said. "Not at all. There," he continued, pointing to the gallows, "there is your punishment if you murder me. You would receive only my share of my wealth."

"And who would be my accuser?"

"I will tell you."

Guy whistled three times, and in a moment a dark form issued from among the trees and approached.

It was his servant.

"You see," said the miser, "I am never unprepared. A murder just now would be excessively inconvenient. Strangle that person, my valet it, and for the present say 'Good-night.'"

Walter Raymond made no remark; but, turning on his heel, walked away.

For an instant the hot blood had mounted to his brain, and he had felt inclined to destroy the man who was the cause of his disgrace and shame; but his good genius was now watching over him, and he escaped such a hasty gratification at the opportune arrival of the man-servant.

Yet his heart, as he retired away towards home, was full of bitterness.

There was no doubting the thorough determination of Guy Raymond not to yield one farthing of the property he had gained, and there seemed no prospect whatever of wringing from him even a promise for the future.

Under these circumstances, the system of depredation which he had commenced would have to proceed, unless he escaped from the clutches of Gideon Mellish, whose exile had now severed themselves around him more strongly than ever.

How this was to be done was a problem which he had not succeeded in solving when he reached home, and found Ella waiting for him at the gate.

"You here, Ella?" he said, in unusual surprise.

"Why, what on earth brings you out in the night air?"

She took his arm and nestled up to him as they walked in, after he had fondly kissed her.

"I have felt nervous and ill all the evening, dearest," she said, "and I could not bear to be alone." Then she added, suddenly, "Have you been there again?"

"Where, dearest?"

"To Guy's Folly."

"No; but I remember my uncle."

"And received the same answer, of course?"

"Yes; he is as determined and as bitter against me as ever. But never mind, the day will come when he will repent it."

The night was dark and cloudy, and not over pleasant; and as Walter entered the house with his wife, and saw the bright fire and the cosy room, warm and cheery-looking, he felt that he would rule anything rather than lose that home.

It was on the following evening that a card was brought up to Ella Raymond, bearing the name of Gideon Crawleigh.

She had learned to receive this man in a friendly manner, because Walter stated that he was necessary to him; and, accordingly, when she saw the name, she at once gave orders that he should be admitted.

In a few minutes the door opened and a gentleman entered.

In the uncertain light of evening she did not at first recognise him; but his voice was enough to undeceive her.

It was Arthur Arbuthnot.

She started up with anger when he spoke to her, saying: "Good evening, Ella!" in an easy, expert-like, gliding tone, which was infinitely annoying to her.

"What do you want here, Sir Arthur?" she cried.

"I wish," he said, with studied politeness, "I wish for a few moments' conversation with you!"

"My husband is not in," she answered, still standing up. "Your business here must be with him, unless it concerns me. In either case it would be best either to postpone your visit to another time."

He seated himself coolly.

"I beg your pardon, my charmer," he said, "but my business is with you, and I would much rather not see your husband. Only a few moments will I detain you—after that, I will go at once."

She made a gesture as if she would have rushed to the door.

He grasped her wrist and detained her.

"It is of no use," he said. "I must and will speak to you."

"Unhand me, sir!" she exclaimed, while her eyes flashed fire and her face became red with excitement—"unhand me, sir, or I will call my servants to eject you."

He laughed lightly.

"I take my precautions better than that," he answered. "Your maid-servant, Emma has gone to Richmond with a letter to Miss Ingleton, your husband, the other servant, Mark, is dispatched to the town with a note from you to your husband, We are alone, Ella, you and I, in this house, and you must, therefore, listen to me."

It required but little force on his part to compel her to sit down, and for a while overcome by announcement he had made completely deprived her of all strength.

"You know your villainy well, sir," she said, in a low, suppressed voice of anger; "but it will not succeed with me. I expect the return of my husband every moment."

"I have but little to say," returned Sir Arthur; "and even should you find me with him, I shall not be gone. You remember that at my mother's house, the other evening, I told you that I loved you. All you replied to me was to remind me that a rich man and a title—as I offered you once—would have been better for you than a gambling debt?"

Ella's face turned deadly pale as he said these words.

"I shall not, sir, if you please," she cried, "but do not ask me to listen to you while you insult my husband. If you came here to repeat what you said the other night, you have wasted your time simply."

"Not by a moment," said Arthur, "that is not all I have to say. I came to tell you something for your own good. In the first place, however, let me ask you a few questions. Are you aware how your husband obtains his money?"

A hot flush mounted to Ella's cheek.

"Yes; I do not."

"Doubtless; but if you do ask, you will find that the manner is disgraceful. Secondly—where is he now?"

"I do not know."

"I will answer, then, both questions. In the first place, your husband obtains his money by robbery and fraud, and spends it in shameful waste and gambling at Devonia scheme."

"How do you know this to me? Why do you tell me this?"

"Because I wish to prove to you to what a reptile you are living. Believe me, Ella," he added, in tones which were intended to be tender, "believe me that I am fond of almost all beautiful things, and not the ugliest. You will see your husband dragged away from you to gaol, and you will be the cast-off, the object of all who know you. I have offered you my love before, I offer to you again; quit this house and fly with me, and I will give you home and comfort."

Again the bold fresh crimson shot her face, and cheek, and bosom—again her breast rose and fell tumultuously.

Then it was with angry shame.

"Coward!" she murmured; "pitiful coward! to thus insult a woman because she is alone and unprotected!"

"I have no longer alone and unprotected," said a voice suddenly, and a man entered the room.

It was Gideon Crawleigh.

His face was very pale, his whole appearance that of a man labouring under strong excitement.

He bowed to Miss Raymond, and then turned towards the young baronet, whose features were now as pale as his.

"Sir Arthur Arbuthnot, I have been a chance listener to your conversation—at least the latter part of it. There are two modes of exit from this room—the door and the window: choose quickly by which you will go out."

Sir Arthur rose.

He was evidently disposed to choose the more pleasant mode of retiring.

"You hear, Mr. Crawleigh!" he said. "This is most strange."

Then he added, with a sneer:

"I thought when you were with Mr. Raymond on one of his merry-making expeditions in Gideon Crawleigh never lost his temper or his presence of mind."

His nerves were like iron; his inner passions never once were let out their awful signs of his will.

He walked quietly to the door, opened it, and said:

"Sir Arthur, Mrs. Raymond desires you to go. Now, not another word, or I pitch you headlong out into the garden."

"Au revoir, Ella!" said Sir Arthur, and passed out quickly.

Ella burst into a fit of tears when he had departed, and staggered away, as if to reach the couch near the fire.

But her strength was gone now, the effort was too much for her; and with a low moan she fell back and fainted, as Gideon, rushing forward, caught her in his arms.

A look of triumph passed over the features of Gideon at this moment, then he glanced round to see if any one was near, and imprinted one passionate kiss upon her lips.

In another moment he had carried her to the couch.

He was just in time, for, as he crossed the hearthrug to reach the bellrope, Walter Raymond entered the room.

THE HOUR OF NORTHERN VICTORY.

BY FANNY EMBLE.

Roll not a drum, sound not a clarion note
Of haughty triumph o'er the silent sky;
Think'st be the silent of joy in every throat,
And veil'd the flash of pride in every eye.

Not with Te Deums lend and high Hosannas,
Greet we the awful victory we have won,
But with our mournful, and lower'd banners,
We stand—our work is done!

Thy work is done, God, terrible and just,
Who laid'st upon our hearts and hands this task,
And kneeling, with our foreheads in the dust,
We venture Amen to ask.

Bleeding and writhing and beneath our sword,
Prostrate our Northern foe, Thy fallen foe,
Struck down by Thee through us, avenging Lord,
By Thy dread hand laid low.

For our own guilt have we been doomed to smite
Those of our own kindred, Thy great wrath to defend;
These, our own flesh and blood, who now unite
In one thing only with us—bravely dying.

Dying how bravely, yet how bitterly!
Not for the better side, but for the worse,
Unholy and unforgiving against Thee
For the bad cause where thou hast set Thy curse.

At whose defeat we may not raise our voice,
Save in the deep thanksgiving of our prayers,
"Lord, we have fought the fight!" But to rejoice
Is ours not in their fears.

Call back Thy dreadful ministers of wrath
Who have laid on our hosts to this great day;
Let our foot halt now in the avenger's path,
And bid our weapons stay.

Upon our land, Peace's inheritance,
Turn Christ, the Conqueror, the splendour of Thy face,
Where nations serving Thee to light shall advance,
Give us again our place.

Not our bewildering past prosperity,
Not all Thy former ill-requited grace,
But that which shall grant us still to be
The home of Hope to the whole human race.

ONLY A CLOD.

CHAPTER XXIV.—FRANCIS TREDETHLYN'S DISINHERITED ADVISER.

SIR THOMAS SOMERVILLE'S wife! Yes, October was near at hand. Already the woods and hills beyond the Star and Garter were bright with autumnal tints of yellow and glowing crimson. Already the milliners and dressmakers, the outfitters and bootmakers, were perpetually appearing in the hall and on the staircase at the Cedars. Mother Seabrook lived with odekin second continually passing in and out of Mr. Hillary's abode, and Maude could rarely enjoy a quiet half-hour undisturbed by a mysterious summons, entreating her to inspect or try on some garment newly brought home by a "young person" from town. Havoort Lowther made himself quite at home both at the Cedars and at Francis Tredethlyn's chambers during this period of preparation. Francis took very kindly to his old master in his new capacity of friend and mentor. The habits of his past made a link between them. The old half-friendly, half-supercilious familiarity which had characterised Havcourt Lowther's treatment of his servant melted now into a playful and almost caressing fondness.

Mr. Lowther was a thoroughly selfish man, and he found himself called upon in the instance to sacrifice his pride in the cause of his interest. He affected a hearty interest in Francis Tredethlyn's affairs, and contrived somehow, by a series of manœuvres, so subtle as to be imperceptible, to install himself in the part of chief adviser to the inexperienced young Cornishman. Mr. Lowther was in the main a very clever man, and a good judge of greatness, or even for any celebrity beyond that species of drawing-room reputation which women are able to bestow on the men who are not too noble to waste a lifetime in small accomplishments and shilly-shallies. He was very plainspoken and rather cynical, very much inclined to quarrel with the decrees of Providence; and in Francis Tredethlyn he found a person with whom he could be himself most ardently desired—a great fortune and Maude Hillary for a wife!

But he was true to his resolution to take matters quietly; and he assisted in the preparations for the wedding with as much outward show of pleasure as if he had been a fashionable mother, rejoicing in the happy dispersal of a whole brood of daughters.

The big mansion in the new district of palatial streets and squares lying between Kensington and Brompton was fitted and furnished under Mr. Lowther's superintendence. Bills had meeting with architects, gilders, decorators and upholsterers; and, with an occasional pretence to Francis, "for form," as he orders as freely as if the house had been his own. Sometimes, walking up and down the drawing-room during these consultations, a strange smile flickered over his face—a contemplative smile, which faded away in the next moment, giving place to the usual expression of fashionable indifference to all things in heaven and earth which was his ordinary expression.

The appointed day came at last, and poor Francis drove down to Twickenham, looking as pale as his light waistcoat, but supported by his friend Harcourt Lowther as best man. Once, and once only, Maude Hillary looked at her discarded lover while she remained Maude Hillary; but there was a world of thought and meaning in that one look. Ah, how different his love must have been from hers! she thought. For her, the fulfilment for which her bride also would have gone far way from the sound of his weddingbells and the sight of his wedding dress! For him, the pain that had seen that he was almost spoken the bridegroom, but she could not forgive him for being there.

There was all the usual fuss. Autumn flowers scattered under the feet of the bride and bridegroom; shawly children, in clean pinafores, cheering as the bride went by; the old familiar carriage drove away; and then a breakfast, and the popping of champagne corks, and the crowning of delicious confusion. Francis was passing forward to caress the bride, loud-voiced young men congratulating the bridegroom, and Maude, white from standing on tiptoe to get a peep at the show; and then the positions crack their whips, and the whole noisy throng is left behind.

Francis was driving, and Maude sees Twickenham town spin by her in a dim glimmer of comfortable English, vanishing redly in cottage windows.

The wedding tour had been amongst the many things which Harcourt Lowther had closely attended to plan for his friend, and after a great deal of deliberation, that gentleman had pitched upon one of the old-world and old-fashioned towns of Devonshire, as the one spot upon all this earth best suited for Mr. Tredethlyn and his bride.

"You don't want to see Continental architecture; the Rhine steamers are crowded with Cockneys, who find it easier to go to Cologne than to negotiate the administration of their tea. What do you know about the ancient crag of Drachenfels, or the purple mists of the Seven? All the hackneyed sentimentality about heavy old knights and battered old castles? You don't specially want to see hobgoblins in their native land, and you would be bothered one of your life before your travels were over—unless you took a courier —and that would be a more serious bother in the eyes of a courier! No, my dear Tredethlyn; the sort of thing for you is some quiet little watering-place—a fashionable one, of course, but not too distant view of the changing sea,' and all that sort of thing; in other words, a tranquil little retreat, where you will have time to learn your bride's tastes, and become acquainted with one another."

Francis was only too glad to take such pleasant advice. He was alone with Maude, and, in the still grey sea in the quiet autumn evenings, seemed to him the highest bliss that earth could hold for any human being. And Francis blessed his generous friend for the sound judgment which had come into such happiness.

"I dare say I should have gone scampering all over the Continent but for you, Lowther," he exclaimed, gratefully. "What shows and sights Cobars advised a tour through half Europe. 'See plenty of life,' they said; 'reckon yourself lucky if you can manage to get through the whole lot!' I began to think that the old country was a regular out-and-out Murray, so as to be able to hold your own in society. Everybody travels nowadays, and it doesn't do for a fellow with lots of time to be behind the rest of the world.' But I'll take your advice, Lowther. I wanted Maude to choose the place for our bridal trip, but she wouldn't, so she says to the Devonshire village."

It is not to be supposed, of course, that Mr. Lowther had any other than the most friendly intention when he selected Combe Western as the residence of Francis Tredethlyn's chaste bride. But on the other hand, it must be confessed that had Harcourt wished to inspire Maude with a weariness of her husband's society, he could have scarcely selected any place better calculated to assist him in the carrying out of his design. At Combe Western the rosy autumn days were unbroken by any change, save the slow changes of the hours, and the gradual darkening of the sky, and there were pleasant drives and romantic scenery to be found in the neighborhood of Combe Western; but Devonshire is a rainy country, and as it rained with little intermission during the whole of that honeymoon period, Francis and Maude's bride was compelled to find her chief amusement in the prim lodging-house drawing-room and the society of her husband.

And this society was not congenial to her. He was handsome, and pleasant to look at; manly, good-tempered, generous. No mean or unworthy sentiment ever dropped from his lips. She respected him, and was grateful to him; nay, even beyond this there was a certain latent affection for him lurking in some corner of her heart, but she was very tired of him nevertheless. To be quite truthful, as we are pledged to tell you of them, is not altogether an impossibility. Are we not sometimes weary of ourselves, when we yet love so dearly? When you get tired of a book you have nothing to do but close the volume and put it on the shelf. But you cannot shut off your friend when he becomes tedious; you must needs go on, wading through page after page of his conversation till you yawn in his face, and arouse him to the unpleasant conviction that he is a nuisance.

Maude was very gratefully and affectionately disposed towards her father's benefactor; but she grew terribly tired of his sole companionship during this rainy week in the quiet Devonian watering-place. If the bride and bridegroom had gone on that stereotyped foreign tour so strongly protested against by Mr. Lowther, Maude's sunny nature would speedily have asserted itself. She would have found in the rapid diversity of scene, in all the incessant excitement of quick travelling, plenty of subject-matter for conversation with her husband; and there would have been always some common ground on which they could have met, some little incident, among the hundred incidents of a traveller's day, which would have aroused a sympathy between them. But thrown on their own resources at Combe Western, a House with Maude and a Maude-Defand might have exhausted their conversational powers, and yawned-them up in each other's faces. Mr. Lowther's quiet wedding for this one of her honeymoon before the first week thereof had drawn to its close; and Francis, always timid and shy with the fair beautiful face, felt a child languish at his heart as he perceived her weariness of spirit.

Then it was that, when they returned to London, the husband and wife were little nearer to each other than on the wedding day. So Francis and Francis' wife each other's thoughts and feelings had arisen during that dull residence at Combe Western. The subtle process of assimilation by which—except in some dismal examples—husband and wife grow like each other in mind and character had not yet begun. They were strangers still; in spite of Maude's esteem for her husband's character, in spite of Francis's doglike devotion to the object of his wife's portions; and Harcourt Lowther, who was one of the guests at their first dinner-party, was not slow to perceive that they were so.

"You'll get on admirably together by-and-bye, dear boy," he said to Francis, as they smoked their cigars after a luxurious little meal shared behind the big library, some days after the great dinner. "You'll get on superbly with your bride by-and-bye, if you only cure your cards shyness. There must be no Darby and Joan business, you know—no sentimentalism. Remember, my daughter is to be brought up to be disgusted by that sort of thing. It was all very well, of course, to do the romantic during the honeymoon; but that's all over and done. Your wife will go her way, and you'll go yours. Her friends will absorb a great deal of her time, and your friends will absorb a great deal of yours. You'll have your club, your horses, your race's parties, and perhaps, by-and-bye, the Commons' seat, which you decided to get for Parliament—and it will be utterly impossible for you to spend all your mornings lounging about your wife's boudoir, and your wife's carriage horses, as you seem to have done hitherto."

"But I like so much to be with her," Francis remonstrated, piteously. "It's very friendly of you to give me these hints, and I dare say you're right, to some degree. I know Maude used to seem very tired of me at Western, and we both got into the habit of looking at our watches in a despairing kind of way every quarter of an hour; but since we've arrived here she has quite recovered her spirits, and we are so happy together; you should see how heartily she laughs at the Punch and Judy show on the Esplanade, and how she runs after the dogs!"

Francis plainly confided himself at this recollection of this fact. Harcourt Lowther shrugged his shoulders, and a frown, or the passing shadow of a frown, darkened his handsome face.

There are some natures in which there is a certain element of childishness, and between such extreme are desperate antagonism is ever likely to arise.

"We were dull at Combe Western," said Mr. Tredethlyn, presently, "but since we've been in London we've got on capitally. I've been everywhere with Maude—shopping even; and I've written out the lists for her parties, and begun a round of calls; and, in short, I've been the happiest fellow in all creation."

"No doubt, my dear boy; that sort of thing's delightful for a fortnight; but look out for the day when you'll get tired of parties and dragon will arise to willing all these Arcadian delights."

Francis pondered gravely. He had been happy in the society of his wife, and, for he had not Maude bright and lively, pleased with the novelty of her position, happy in her father's affectionate welcome, serene in the consciousness of pure intentions, and grateful for the devotion, of which some new evidence met her at every turn. Poor Francis had been entirely happy; but it needed only a whisper from an elegant Mephistopheles in modern costume to render this simple Cornishman very pleased to be discontented and unhappy. It needed only a sham and delusion after all, and Maude's smallest smile might be the smile of a victim consigned to the sacrifice.

"If you think that Maude is likely to grow tired—" Francis began, in a very melancholy tone; but Mr. Lowther interrupted him,

"If I think, my dear boy. How dare I do otherwise than think what is obvious to the dullest apprehension. Take life as other people take it, my dear, unspeculated. Particularly, I say, and find it my sincerity enough with you. Try to live on a plain and practical basis—without romance. You are a man, and no man living in the world could exist without seeing a horse to be sold at Tattersall's, a well-mixed collection of pictures at Christie and Manson's; a bachelor's dinner at a club; a review at Wimbledon—somehow or other there was always something to be seen, or something to be done, or a nature in which Mrs. Tredethlyn could not have her own part and her own interest; and when Francis and his friend dined alone with her, as they did very often, it happened somehow that on no occasion was she a source of dreamy and masculine character, painfully wearisome to the ordinary female mind. If Mr. Lowther had been short on walking the natural gulf which circumstance had set between these two people, he could scarcely have gone to work more skilfully than he did to widen it. It is of course to be presumed that he was only an unconscious instrument, an involuntary agent of mischief and ruin.

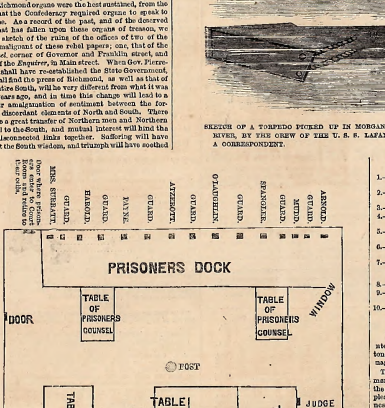
VIEWS IN RICHMOND.



THE newspapers of the South took, from the commencement, the greatest pleasure in fanning the flame of rebellion, and they were the first to feel the evil effects of rebellion. One after another had to discontinue their publication, until, two years ago, there were but very few of these pestilent organs existing. The Richmond organs were the best sustained, from the fact that the Confederacy required organs to speak to Europe. As a record of the past, and of the deserved fate that has fallen upon these organs of treason, we give a sketch of the ruins of the offices of two of the most malignant of these rebel papers; one, that of the Sentinel, corner of Governor and Franklin street, and that of the Inquirer, in Main street. When Gov. Pierrepoint shall have re-established the State Government, we shall find the press of Richmond, as well as that of the entire South, will be very different from what it was four years ago, and in time this change will lead to a greater amalgamation of sentiment between the formerly dissentient elements of North and South. There will be a great transfer of Northern men and Northern capital to the South, and mutual interest will bind the now disconnected links together. Suffering will have taught the South wisdom, and triumph will have soothed

Presented to Gen. Grant.

ON Thursday, May 25th, Mr. John Foley, the manufacturer, No 166 Broadway, New York, presented to Gen. Grant his celebrated gold pen "Vicksburg," which was formerly a striking object at the sanitary Fair. In responding, the hero remarked that "the question as to whether the pen is mightier than the sword has not yet been definitely settled." The handle of this masterpiece is of ivory. The pen itself is of 18 carat gold, and weighs one ounce; cost to manufacture, $75.

VIEWS IN CHARLESTON, S. C

SO many of our citizens are going southwards, now that the Government has thrown the rest of the "Confederacy" open to Northern enterprise, that sketches of Southern cities cannot fail to be useful and interesting. We give to-day two sketches in Charleston, a city which offers the most signal instance of magnanimity in history.

The old cemetery on South Broad street possesses many monuments belonging to the oldest families in the city, and their variety of architecture gives it a pleasant look somewhat out of keeping with the gloominess and silence of death. The trees also invest it with an additional feature, and altogether, since death is inevitable, there are fewer calmer spots for one wearied of the world to take his rest in, and exemplify the oft quoted verse:

After life's fitful fever he sleeps well.

The sketch we publish of the remains of the new bridge over Ashley river affords another to the myriad others, of the utter recklessness with which the rebels destroyed everything they came near when they had no immediate use for it. The new bridge was built about 10 years ago, and was a great convenience to the Charlestonians. When the rebels evacuated the city on the 18th of February they partially destroyed it, more, it is said, out of spite to the inhabitants than to retard the Federal forces.

Our artist has made his sketch from the foot of Bee street; and introduced a characteristic sight, and one common enough to the time of his visit—a comical old crab tossing a slave family from some plantation up the river to the military protection of the city.

ARMENIAN WOMEN.—It would appear that nowhere is the patriarchal system carried to a greater extent than among the Armenians. During the lifetime of the father, all the sons and their descendants live together in one common dwelling; and thus houses may be constructed, from the number of their inhabitants, resemble bee-hives, often comprising three or four generations. All the property is held in common by the descendants of the head of the house. Brothers and sisters inherit equally, but until the death of the head no one can possess anything separate from all the others. Until marriage the Armenian girls go about in the streets; they are unveiled, and enjoy as much freedom as they could do in European countries. Eating, love-making and marrying is pleasantly intermingled in their existence. But once married, and all is changed. From that time until she bears a child she is a mere drudge to her mother-in-law's household, and takes no part in private. After she becomes a mother, she may speak to her mother-in-law first, and, after the lapse of certain periods, to her own mother, her sisters-in-law, and her own sisters. She is always veiled, even in her own house; she never speaks to male strangers, and she seldom or never leaves the house. Her finery, jewellery and ornaments can be shown only to those of her own sex; and in every way her seclusion is as complete as that of the Turkish women. On the other hand, the Armenian women seldom do any hard work; they remain at home while their husbands labor in the fields, and they enjoy, probably on account of their acquaintance prior to marriage, much more respect and confidence from their husbands than falls to the share of the Turkish wife, who, moreover, has to divide with two or three rivals the little affection or respect which her husband deigns to bestow on her. As the Armenian woman can only talk in her own house below her breath, that some of her male relatives may hear what she says, it follows that the colloquence which usually results from the residence of so many women in one house, frequent quarrelling, is quite avoided. Custom, the strongest of all laws, forbids them to speak above a whisper. A war of words could only be carried on under great difficulties; and as yet, at least, wrestling on the fingers, which would likewise require a knowledge of spelling, an accomplishment very few of them possess, has not introduced to facilitate the interchange of hostilities between the ancient enemies, mother and daughter-in-law. Yet it is not easy to realize the idea of a large family circle at which all the latest scandal, only conversing among themselves in whispers.

ROCKS YIELDING PETROLEUM.—In a paper upon this subject in the scientific press, the following conclusions relative to the proper method of working the petroleum rocks are stated:

1.—Each widely-separated locality must be governed by its own laws, as developed by boring and observation.

2.—Each geological horizon of oil-bearing rock, receives its supply and from another, but from causes operating at the time of its deposition.

3.—Each rock may be supposed to be of one, or several, strata from fountains filled of oil.

4.—Strata are so thoroughly saturated with oil as to form a subterranean sheet of rocks where petroleum is sure to be found. The oil occurs in frequent isolated masses, at various depths, and of various sizes, and containing different grades of oil.

THE Brazilian journals would seem to entvie Baron Munchausen in the discoveries of natural wonders. They tell of a tree on the banks of the Branco, a tributary of the river Amazon, under the canopy of which 10,000 human beings may find shelter, and the height of which is such, that a gigantic bird, the Condor-Jumbo, another wonder of the basin of the Amazon, perches itself so high up the branches, as to

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES.

$230,000,00.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, as General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the Seven-Thirty Loan.

These Notes are issued under date of July 15th, 1865 and are payable three years from that date, in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 6-20 Six per cent. GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum, to their value.

The interest of Thirty cents per day on each

One cent per day on a	$50 note.
Two cents " " "	$100 "
Ten " " "	$500 "
20 " " "	$1,000 "
$1 " " "	$5,000 "

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Seven-Thirty Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already sold, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent. instead of 7-3-10ths in currency. Subscribers will detect the interest in currency at 7-3-10ths, at the same rate they subscribe.

The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-thirty will commence on the 1st of June, and will be made promptly and systematically thereafter.

The slight change made in the conditions of this Third Series affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices, that purchases made with a view to gold would be found to be as well made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency, as in gold.

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

now offered by the Government, and its superior advantages will make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $200,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has always been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agencies in which to pay the money, and those who only wish to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

A BRILLIANT NOVEL.

Family Failings!

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE HENPECKED HUSBAND," "THE OLD LOVE AND THE NEW," "THE MARRYING MAN," Etc.

"The Gilbert Author of Family Failings has vividly portrayed a series of characters, scenes and incidents, which cannot fail of making a deep impression upon the minds of those who contain a very bright into the realm of social life in its higher walks, this work can be an important lesson; and aside from its absorbing interest as a novel, the young person can fail to be both wiser and better from its perusal."—London Weekly Dispatch.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical PINEAPPLE CIDER.

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years enables him that it is a true public benefactor to spread before the people the virtues of this remedy. Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the people. One quart bottle of this will prevent one from sickness. This is not a new remedy of Medicine, but a new application from the old. It is better to pay three dollars a year to keep you well than to pay one dollar to cure you when ill. A doctor's bills, and an much more for the loss of time and the interest on your business. To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after pouring in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York physician, who has used Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month by the first trial, and continues the use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial, says it is the only remedy that enables him to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used Dr. Talbot's Cider constantly or ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

This wonderful Preparation will increase the strength, give vigor and life to the system, and purchase digestion. When taken internally, for pains of all kinds, Rheumatism, Sciatica, Neuralgia, Pains in the Chest, Hoarseness, Coughs, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Pains in the Back, Debility of the Stomach, etc., etc., for exciting and quieting effect on the system it is unequalled by anything.

For Women, as nothing physician, employed with the greatest success in Female Weakness, Uterine Affections and Irregularities, Nervous Debility, Palpitation of the Heart, Chronic Diarrhœa, Cold Dysentery, and Diseases of the Kidneys, it is unequalled. It is also particularly recommended by physicians to delicate females, as it will not produce Nausea, Vomiting, Headache, Want of Appetite, Sprouts, Nightmare, Restlessness, Flushing of the Face, and will not fail to relieve Pain in the Liver, Wakefulness, Disturbed Sleep, etc. American Ginseng, which is used with great success to heighten their color and beauty. It imparts cheerfulness to the disconsolate, and gives a healthy appearance. To travellers especially it is of inestimable value, and will be found invaluable in case of sickness, as nothing which the water is likely to vary in quality and temperature will have any effect upon the system if they adopt it with the utmost confidence as a timely, efficacious remedy.

Art of Painting Photographs in Water Colors.

Complete in one Volume, bound in cloth. Also a full set of FRENCH IMPORTED COLORS, in the original powdered state. Brushes, etc.

Price One Dollar. (Copyright secured.)

How beautiful! how charming! to be able to color your own Photographs, without the assistance of a master, and at so little expense! "Let your homes be ornamented with works of your own genius."

To be able to color a photograph handsomely is certainly a superior accomplishment, and the art at present confined to a few. The object of Madame Le Pierre's treatise is to place within the power of everybody the means to Color Photographs both pleasing and admirable.

Agents wanted everywhere throughout the country. Very liberal inducements offered.

One copy of the Art, handsomely bound in cloth, a full set of imported paints (in original powders), and a set of brushes will be sent to any address, mailed free, for $1. Circulars sent free upon application. Address or call on CRAWFORD & WILLIS, No. 167 Broadway, New York City. 504-506

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 167 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Valuable Jewellery, originally intended for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have resolved upon a Great Gift Apportionment to be divided according to the following regulations:

CERTIFICATES of the various articles are first put into envelopes indiscriminately, sealed up, and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus showing no favoritism.

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

Send 25 Cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for 10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered for them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps.
ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, varying in value, and all are offered for $1 each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certificate of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, and are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with the article, which will certainly be worth more than that amount, and may be $50 or $100. An excellent mode this of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, New York City, Feb. 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy of public confidence.—New York Scottish American Journal, June 11, 1864.

We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency for European Manufacturing Jewellery, a large assortment of fashionable and valuable jewellery of the newest patterns. We also noticed a large quantity of silver-plate, and understand that the whole of these newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a novel principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents. We know the firm in question to be a very respectable and thoroughly worthy of public confidence, and recommend our friends to read their advertisement.—New York Albion, Sept. 3, 1864.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co's arrangement, the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he has everything to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. He knows what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—New York Weekly News, Aug. 6, 1864.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, not only filling her own purse, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sold the Certificates, as will be seen from our advertising columns. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged.—New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1864.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewellery and silver-ware. In payment of that advertisement we received several sets of the jewellery advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Lewistown), Aug. 17, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 20 articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals, accurately united together and plandered producing an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcanum, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are admitted to closely resemble the real. Case is beautifully designed, with Fancy and Shield for name, with Patent Bezel, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsome and durable, and so exact an imitation of gold, as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known 58 Home Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having engraved plates, jewelled balance, adjusting regulator with gold balance, and the improved patty jewelled action. With fine and reliable hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $12. A single one sent in the United States for $2, will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for the watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Proclamation of Amnesty.

THE President has issued his Amnesty Proclamation, dated May 29th. It is a most important document, and will probably greatly disappoint a considerable body of men in the lately rebellious States, who are excluded by its provisions from taking a part in the reorganization of those States. Under this proclamation the "restoration of the Union as it was," in which smooth and apparently harmless phrase is concealed all that the rebels now desire, namely, the perpetuation of slavery, slave representation, "States rights," and all other evils and heresies that originated the war, become an impossibility. The leaders and promoters of the rebellion can take no part in making the Union what it ought to be and was designed to be by its founders. The President makes the acceptance of Mr. Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation that "impotent Pope's bull against the comet," of which we heard so much) a potential reality. No man can resume his rights in the Union or exercise any political privileges who does not accept that proclamation as a final and irrevocable act.

President Johnson extends amnesty and pardon, and restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, to all persons who have directly or indirectly participated in the rebellion, on condition of taking the following oath:

"I, ——, do solemnly swear (or affirm) in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder, and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves; so help me God."

Those exempted from amnesty and pardon are classified as follows:

"First. All who are or shall have been pretended civil or diplomatic officers, or otherwise domestic or foreign agents, of the pretended Confederate Government.

"Second. All who left judicial stations under the United States to aid the rebellion.

"Third. All who shall have been military or naval officers of said pretended Confederate Government above the rank of colonel in the army, or lieutenant in the navy.

"Fourth. All who left seats in the Congress of the United States to aid the rebellion.

"Fifth. All who resigned or tendered resignations of their commissions in the army or navy of the United States, to evade duty in resisting the rebellion.

"Sixth. All who have engaged in any way in treating otherwise than lawfully, as prisoners of war, persons found in the United States service as officers, soldiers, seamen, or in other capacities.

"Seventh. All persons who have been or are absentees from the United States for the purpose of aiding the rebellion.

"Eighth. All military and naval officers in the rebel service who were educated by the Government in the Military Academy at West Point, or the United States Naval Academy.

"Ninth. All persons who held the pretended offices of Governors of States in insurrection against the United States.

"Tenth. All persons who left their homes within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States, and passed beyond the Federal military lines into the so-called Confederate States, for the purpose of aiding the rebellion.

"Eleventh. All persons who have been engaged in the destruction of the commerce of the United States upon the high seas, and all persons who have made raids into the United States from Canada, or been engaged in destroying the commerce of the United States upon the lakes and rivers that separate the British Provinces from the United States.

"Twelfth. All persons who, at the time when they seek to obtain the benefit hereof by taking the oath herein prescribed, are in military, naval or civil confinement or custody, or under bonds of the civil, military or naval authorities or agents of the United States, as prisoners of war, or persons charged for offences of any kind either before or after conviction.

"Thirteenth. All persons who have voluntarily participated in said rebellion, and the estimated value of whose taxable property is over twenty thousand dollars.

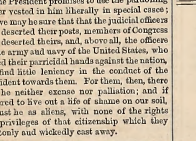
"Fourteenth. All persons who have taken the oath of amnesty as prescribed in the President's proclamation of December 8, A.D. 1863, or an oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States since the date of said Proclamation, and who have not thereafter kept and maintained the same inviolate; provided, that special application may be made to the President for pardon by any person belonging to the excepted classes, and such clemency will be liberally extended as may be consistent with the facts of the case and the peace and dignity of the United States."



The thirteenth exception is one of great significance. It is intended to exclude from participation in the reorganization of the rebellious States that influential class of large property holders, who, before the war, held almost exclusive political control in the South, overbearing equally the wishes and interests of the masses of the people, and who kept alive the restless, selfish, intractable spirit which developed itself finally in civil war. The course of reconstruction will probably be shaped by the means of conventions, called together by legislatures elected by loyal men and those who accept the oath above prescribed, under the protection of the military authority of the Government, which is bound to guarantee to each State a republican form of government. Such a constitution will, no doubt, entirely revise the old State constitutions, making them conform to the new order of things, and to the state of facts created by the Emancipation Proclamation of Mr. Lincoln. The Government, in all its departments, recognises that proclamation as vital and final in the revolutionary process. The military authorities recognise no such condition as slavery, or any class of men as slaves. The acceptance of the Constitutional Amendment by the requisite number of States would only abolish slavery in Kentucky and Delaware. Mr. Lincoln's proclamation as understood and enforced by the Government, has finished it everywhere else.

The President promises to use the pardoning power vested in him liberally in special cases; but we may be sure that the judicial officers who described their posts, members of Congress who deserted theirs, and, above all, the officers of the army and navy of the United States, who raised their parricidal hands against the nation, will find little leniency in the conduct of the President towards them. For them, then, there can be neither excuse nor palliation; and if suffered to live out a life of shame on our soil, it must be as aliens, with none of the rights and privileges of that citizenship which they wantonly and wickedly cast away.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

OF

FRANK LESLIE'S

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold

Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more nearly surpassing having been received for it than to any publication of the time.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Citizens, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at a cost of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have rendered our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 will be presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

The value of the Petroleum product of Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Ohio, already exceeds that of the entire yield of the gold mines of California, and the rapid development of this immense interest has hardly commenced. Hitherto, it has been left to wild and reckless speculation, closely allied to gambling, in lands and leases, in some cases of great value, but in many of small or unsafe tenures, without applying thereto the necessary capital to develop their true worth and productive power. This speculative fever, which grew out of the enormous profits of the first few wells sunk, and the Petroleum business is taking regular and healthful shape. It is reduced to a system of careful and profitable investment, and is no longer a matter of mere chance and lucky hit in the field. Its founders have visited and examined all the oil districts, and have put their property through an experienced agent they have carefully selected, and who has had the refusal of the farm on which a long-established and profitable business is done. It is inviting subscriptions, the Officers of the Company having determined to offer the opportunity to purchase their property, plans and proceedings, that may be desired. The Company owns 100 acres, and has leases by steady enterprise and faithful work. These have never failed of success in getting oil in paying quantities, and the thousands of "fortunate men" whom we see rapidly and unexpectedly growing rich around us, are living effects. The Petroleum business is in its infancy. Its operations are yet in the hands of men, to be educated; but here nevertheless already numerous and certain fortunes are made by the comparatively few with present increasing production. In 1864 the total export of Petroleum was 2,500,000 gallons; and in 1865 it will be 25,000,000 gallons; and in 1866 to 75,000,000 gallons, valued at 50,000,000 dollars. Such a rapid increase in quantity surmised at home, astonishing to over 20,000,000 of people.

The property of the Company consists of lands in fee and leases, as follows:

Lands in Fee!

Lot 1.—Two hundred and twenty acres on Pew Pew Creek, Washington county, Ohio. This property embraces the Marietta and Cincinnati Railroad, producing wells within half a mile of this property, and wells are now being sunk on all sides of it. The position and prospects of this tract are unsurpassed.

Lot 2.—Eighty acres, also on the Pew Pew, of equal value and corresponding indications.

Leasehold Lands:

Lot 3.—Forty acres on Newell's Run, Ohio, about three-fourths of a mile from the Ohio river, 12 miles above Marietta. Good prospects; well boring and about below on the farm; one of 30 barrels per day, and another lease well on Smith's Run, within half a mile. This lease has 20 years to run, and stores and all the oil on the premises to the Company.

Lot 2.—Fifty acres on Big Run, Wood county, West Virginia, two miles from the Ohio River, and about three miles from Marietta; lease 20 years to run. See Article 4th of the oil belonging to the Company.

Lot 3.—Thirty acres on Big Run, Wood county, West Virginia, two and a half miles from the Ohio River; lease 20 years and Company's interest, three-eighths of the oil.

Lot 4.—One hundred and twenty-five acres on Big Run, Wood county, West Virginia, two miles from the Ohio River; lease 20 years and Company's interest, three-eighths of the oil.

Lot 5.—Forty acres on Pew Pew Creek, Washington County, Ohio, about seven miles from Marietta, and about one and a half miles from Newtonton, on the Muskingum River; lease 16 years, and Company's interest, three-fifths of the oil.

Lot 6.—Twenty-five acres on Pinch Run (W. Virginia), and about half a mile from the Ohio River; 25 years to run, and the Company's interest five sixths of the oil. This property there are two oil springs, and the oil may be seen on the surface of the Run.

The length of time which these leases have to run, renders the value of the property there to become high.

RECAPITULATION.

Lands in Fee	300 acres.
Lands on Leasehold	405 acres.
Of which Fifty-three-eighths of the oil.
" 15 acres carry six-sevenths of the oil.
" 125 acres carry three-eighths of the oil.
" 80 acres carry four-fifths of the oil.

Grant and Sherman.

THE calm, steadfast, self-sacrificing, generous spirit of Lieut. Gen. Grant is hardly yet appreciated by his countrymen, but it will give him ultimately the highest place in American military history. As a soldier he struck the first, the second, the third and the last great blows of the war—at Fort Donelson, at Vicksburg, at Chattanooga and at Petersburg. With a courage, decision and persistency unsurpassed, he combines a modesty and a large generosity which never centered in a single individual. The history of his relations with his able and daring, but flighty and ambitious lieutenant, Sherman, brings out his prominent and most admirable traits with wonderful distinctness. In the great Western campaign which resulted in the capture of Vicksburg, and with it the opening of the Mississippi and the severance of the so-called Confederacy, Sherman by no means endorsed the plans of Grant. He had his own notions, and was so strongly impressed with them that he was almost to the limits of insubordination in his hostility to the operations of his superior. The New York Times of May 29th publishes an interesting account of the Vicksburg campaign, which no one has ventured to call in question, which does Sherman's impetuous temper and selfish wrong-headedness full justice, and equally illustrates the majestic calmness of Grant, his forbearance, judgment and generosity. The scrap of history published by the Times is as follows:

"Just before Gen. Grant initiated his splendid campaign against Vicksburg, in the spring of 1863, and after the final decision had been made for swinging clear from the base of supplies on the Mississippi river, to the rear of Vicksburg, and to make a decisive attack, to the rear of Vicksburg, he was called upon by Gen. Sherman to meet him at Memphis.

"Gen. Grant, I feel it to be my duty to say that as a subordinate officer, I do not approve of the present co-operation in this movement; but having no command, I feel it my duty to only lower rank on all such. The position and prospects of this trust are unsurpassed.

Lot 2.—Eighty acres, also on the Pew Pew, of equal value and corresponding indications.

Leasehold Lands:

Lot 3.—Forty acres on Newell's Run, Ohio, about three-fourths of a mile from the Ohio river, 12 miles above Marietta. Good prospects; well boring and about below on the farm; one of 30 barrels per day, and another lease well on Smith's Run, within half a mile. This lease has 20 years to run, and stores and all the oil on the premises to the Company.

"Sherman, I will not be any party to any such campaign against Vicksburg, in the spring of 1863, and after the final decision had been made for swinging clear from the base of supplies on the Mississippi river, to the rear of Vicksburg, and to make a decisive attack, to the rear of Vicksburg, he was called upon by Gen. Sherman to meet him at Memphis.

"Gen. Grant, I feel it to be my duty to say that as a subordinate officer, I do not approve of the present co-operation in this movement; but having no command, I feel it my duty to only lower rank on all such. The position and prospects of this trust are unsurpassed.

"Very well, Sherman, I have no more to say. If you are determined to go along your project, I'll take care of you."

"The next day Gen. Grant received Gen. Sherman's letter, in which the latter announced that he had started, in fact, in less than three months, in the surrender of Vicksburg, and the opening of the Mississippi. From Johnston to Pemberton's capitulation, but after it was morally certain that the rebel stronghold must fall, Gen. Sherman rode up to Gen. Grant's headquarters one day, and found his chief stretched on the ground beneath his tent, endeavoring to keep as cool as possible in the sultry midsummer weather. They were chatting pleasantly on the prospects of the quickly approaching success, when Gen. Grant's Assistant Adjutant-General came up and asked him for a certain paper of official importance.

"It is well known that Gen. Grant entered upon the campaign without any personal bias save that a boldness, and thus accounts for the fact that his official records were carried in the breast-pocket of his military blouse. Taking a handful of documents from the receptacle, he selected the one that had been asked for, and before putting the rest away drew forth a second paper from the pocket. Then, turning to Sherman, with a merry twinkle in his eye, he said: 'Bye-bye, General, here is something which will interest you.' Sherman took it, and saw the 'protest' which a little more than two days before he had handed to him. Grant to be forwarded to Washington through the proper channels. Sherman's face flushed with mingled vexation, dismay and surprise. Sherman's nervous fingers, with their usual energy, tore the document into fragments. Grant took the paper from his hand, and, rising, walked quietly to the nearest window to the window. No further allusion to the matter was made between them.

This was perhaps the first, but it was by no means the last time that Grant undertook to bear the brunt of the gallant and impetuous subordinate. When Sherman made his astounding truce and "arrangement" with Johnston, which caused the whole loyal North to hold its breath with surprise and alarm, it will be remembered that the act was not only unanimously repudiated by the Government, with the concurrence of Gen. Grant, but also by the people. There never was such an unanimity of disapproval, not to say censure. The rudest ejaculation of the public was, "Is the man mad?" As for the unrestrained language that made thinking men shudder. The Government not only rejected the whole "arrangement" but sent Gen. Grant to the North-West to assume command and press Johnston on to immediate surrender. Gen. Halleck took occasion, at this time, to make himself unnecessarily offensive by a general order which, as a regret to say, the Government did not openly repudiate then, but which it has practically censured since. It was this order that made respectable banishment anywhere, as the Pacific coast, where his opportunities for evil will be too limited to be dangerous. With Grant's usual promptness concerning Gen. Grant, on his arrival in Sherman's camp, did not remove that officer, but permitted him to carry out the peremptory orders of the Government and receive Johnston's surrender. It was only the natural and inevitable consequence of Lee's capitulation.

Immediately Sherman made his report—and a very intemperate one it was—which was sent to Gen. Grant (not to the Secretary of War as has been said, and who has been wrongfully accused of censuring it). Gen. Grant, more anxious for Gen. Sherman's reputation than Sherman himself, withheld it until he could communicate with him, and then, May 25th, addressed him a letter through his Adjutant, suggesting that he (Sherman) should amend his report. Circumstances would not permit him quickly to forget. It is he did the Vicksburg protest, until his hot-headed subordinate should recover his equilibrium; so he did what he deemed next best for the reputation of his most meritorious officer. But Sherman's quick temper could not be calmed even by his best friend, and his report is before the country—characteristic, but damaging to no one but its author.

Gen. Grant, after calling Sherman's attention to some points in his report, added with characteristic delicacy: "If you should wish, the report will be returned for any change you deem best." To this Sherman replied declining the opportunity to change his report, thus generously offered him. His language is:

"I wish to renew the assurance of my entire confidence and respect for the President and for you, Grant, and that in all matters I will be most willing to receive official and private orders from their wishes. The past is beyond my control, and the manner of rendering official reports is fixed by custom and are finished. It is but just the reasons that actuated me at the time should stand as my excuse. In all future cases, should any arise, I will respect the decisions of my superiors." (Sherman's underscore.)

Gen. Sherman's assurance that he will "respect" the decisions of his superiors "in all future cases" is refreshing. The American people and all the United States can find means to command that respect from his subordinates, however high they may imagine themselves to be. The reception of all the gallantry and a grateful people can command to put up with language like this even from one of its ablest, most successful and most distinguished generals. Sherman's "arrangement" with Johnston was received with angry derision by the whole country, and the prompt and decisive action of the Government upon it was not, as Gen. Sherman supposes, the act of Mr. Stanton or the personal inspiration of any one. It was a mild rebuke of the most unanimous and overwhelming judgment of the whole people. As observed by the London Spectator:

"The first attempt of a general to assume individual responsibility for the settlement of a war is a stupid as well as a dangerous one. We have never doubted that such would be the result of Sherman's attempt to play the statesman character which this war has made clear, is something very much greater than genius, and that the relations and the Union armies are merely those of commander and commanded. Sherman, called Gen. Grant made the same mistake, and attempted to carry out a popular policy without first asking directly against it, the result would be the same. Mr. Johnson's policy is not yet obeyed. That reverence for the law which once enabled the South to snatch a fugitive slave from the midst of the population of Massachusetts, all collected in Boston and a shining with grief and rage, now makes the North strong to enforce the purpose of putting an end to slavery."

Now that Davis and Stephens have both "abdicated," or at least are not in a position to exercise much authority, the Presidency of the Southern Confederacy devolves upon the Speaker of the rebel House of Congress, Thomas S. Bocock, of Virginia, is the fortunate individual. He has not yet risen to his appearance to receive the oath of office, but is supposed, in anticipation of the event of his ascension, to be busily employed, in retirement, on his inaugural. Among the first documents submitted to his consideration will doubtless be a certain able report from Gens. Lee, Johnston, Taylor and Kirby Smith.

VICTOR HUGO has written a letter on the death of President Lincoln, in which he says:

"At the moment when I was writing, the North was victorious and Lincoln alive. To-day Lincoln is dead. The North remains victorious, and remains the victor. The South has gained nothing by this crime.

"Slavery is dead.

"It is abolished by the glorious means with which it has been attacked, through the excessive strain by which it has been defended.

"Long live liberty! Long live the republic!"

CAPT. FERGUS, in his testimony in the assassination case now going on in Washington, declared that he was in Montreal last February; that he knew Sanders and Cleary by sight very well; and that on one occasion they stood near him and he heard their conversation.

"The conversation I heard took place at St. Lawrence Hall in the evening; was not certain whether it was the 16th or 17th of February. I was sitting in a chair at the door, and Sanders and William Cleary walked in the door; they stopped about ten feet from me; I heard Cleary say: 'I suppose we're getting ready for the inauguration of Lincoln next month.' Sanders said, 'Yes, but if the papers have been lying, Lincoln will not live to see much longer.' Cleary said, 'If everything will do Sanders replied, 'Oh, yes, Booth is keeping the job.'"

IT appears in evidence before the court trying the assassins that the President, the Vice-President, Buchanan's Secretary of the Interior, and one of the rebel gang of operators in Canada, on several occasions purchased greenbacks, in considerable amounts, direct from the bank; and he, doubtless, forgot to make purchases of currency secured by the brokers of Montreal. The significance of these conversions arises from the fact that one national currency would be dear to the rebels as only within our borders, and they therefore prove the employment of agents who solicited the loyal States as the source of their nefarious operations.

GEN. CRES. G. HALPIN, not unknown as "MAJ. O'REILLY," publishes a card in the N. Y. Citizen, in doing which (and as indication of his own purposes) he is "reminded of a little story," and that of Mr. Lincoln:

"Our late President was once speaking about an attack made on him by the committee on the conduct of the War for a certain alleged blunder, or something worse, in the management of the military affairs, about which had fallen directly under the observation of the officer to whom he was talking, who expressed official evidence completely upsetting all the conclusions of the committee.

"'Shall it not be well for me,' queried the officer, 'to set this matter right by a letter for some paper stating the facts as they actually transpired?'

"'No, my friend,' replied President Lincoln, 'not now. If I were to try to read, much less answer, all the attacks made on me, the days would not suffice for me for any other business. I do the very best I know how, the very best I can, and mean to keep doing so to the end. If the end brings me out all right, what is said against me will amount to nothing. If the end brings me out wrong, no angels swearing I was right would make no difference.'"

THE coincidences of history are sometimes not only curious, but amusing. If one were to attempt a parallel between the despotic characters of Andros, the colonial governor of Massachusetts, and Jeff. Davis, he could light upon one of those ludicrous coincidences. The captors of the southern republican and slaveocratic reproved "that he hastily put on one of his wife's dresses and attached to the woods, closely followed by our men, who at first thought it was a woman, but seeing the fellow while running, they suspected his sex at once," and he was immediately captured in spite of petticoats.

During the revolution of the 17th century, in New England, brought about by the tyrannical conduct of the governor, Gov. Andros, Jeff. Davis's own despot tried to escape from the exasperated men of Boston, and nearly succeeded. "Disguised in woman's clothes he had ridely passed two sentries, but was stopped by a third, who observed his shoes, which he had neglected to change."

Verily the boots and shoes are small tell-tales, and remind one of the lines in Edward Moore's fable, "The Spider and the Bee":

"But your fine airy handicraft is found
The very same his power to wound."

EUTAPH.

Fame, for an instant, loyal reader,
Here lies Jeff., the great secesher.
Move, as a wayfarer, you know,
And view the place he lies below.
His bow was furnished with two strings.
He hated Cæsarism, and fiercely on Slaves
Rigged his country's care with evil:
And proof it is that God says well the Devil.
The South could whip the Yankee nation,
So he proposed Secession!
Their bludgeon were so everlasting.
"Then I am Boss, for prayer and fasting!
The record may be search'd, in vain,
From Wit to Precedent, to Sain,
To find a more atrocious knave,
Unless it be Jesse Georgia grave.

THE magistrates of Canada have singular notions of the degrees of crime. After the preliminary examination taken at Toronto of Blackburn's plot to infect our cities with yellow fever—compared with which any other rebel atrocity seems light—the magistrate before whom the case was brought accepted bail for Blackburn's appearance for trial at the next assizes, in the sum of $8,000! We suppose that if Booth had been in Blackburn's place, Dick Ingleberry Jeffreys would have let him off for $1,000, and taken George Sanders as security.

THE receipts for customs in San Francisco for 1864 were $6,978,600; in Boston, $8,088,000; in Philadelphia, $3,620,000. Thus it appears that in respect of amount of duties collected, San Francisco has, in 11 years, passed Philadelphia, and nearly reached Boston. From being quite recently the fifth city ranking behind New Orleans and Baltimore, it has become the third in point of commercial importance, and in two or three years will be second to New York alone. Besides direct trade with Europe and the Pacific colonies of Great Britain, San Francisco has been gradually attracting a portion of that Asiatic commerce which we have thought to make it equal in wealth and importance to New York, and one of the three greatest commercial emporiums of the world. The fact that it has located in the best and almost the only harbor on a coast line of 1,500 miles in length, partly accounts for its concentration of population and trade; but the reasons for it permanently the ascendency it already enjoys

The following story is told of Mr. Chase, while in Key West: "A distinguished negro known as "Sandy," he promised a carte-de-visite and a hundred dollars one dollar bill. "Ahs," says Sandy, "now I know you, massa, you are 'cold greenbacks.'"

THE London Spectator says that photographs of Mr. Adams may be purchased in the United States, an item greatly demand in London, where this country is now looked on as one of the first great powers of the earth. The London Times says:

"These photographs show a strongly-built man, with a square head, overhanging brows, full lips, heavy jaw, and flat cheeks. A strong man evidently; but not, we should say, a genial one, a man not to be opposed, but also not much to be loved, certainly not one to be loved with the maternal force whatever. Every incident recorded on this deepens our conviction that in him we have an American statesman, who, for good or for evil thing, so he told a Pennsylvania deputation, that he was born for war, and will sometimes be apt to believe l'etat c'est moi."

A CAPT. ROSS, of the Austrian service, has published a book entitled "A Year on the Staff of the Camps of the Confederate States." It is thoroughly European, Austrian and rebel, and comes rather late to serve the Confederate cause, which appears to have been its purpose. The author never heard of Mr. Lincoln's plan for giving slavel According to Ross, from childhood to old age the slave on a Southern plantation led a life of unbroken happiness, was never whipped, never over-worked, never punished with stripes, and only on rare occasions torn from his wife and children. Ross is a fool, and his book is a fool, no other human lot would endure comparison with the luxurious existence of a negro whom a benign fortune had cast into the hands of so humane an employer. Of the slaves, the Austrian captain observes, "They are singularly attached to their masters, and would shed the last drop of blood in greatest kindness." These kind masters not only feed, clothe and shelter their own darlings, but they would promptly shoot the man who presumed to molest them: "If any one in the South wished to make quiet sure of getting into trouble, he need only abuse or illtreat a negro; and though the 'boy' might be submissive, he would soon have every white man in the neighborhood down upon him, and perhaps a revolver or two emptied into his body." "The Charlestonians," says the author, "are fully determined never to give up their city to the Yankees except in ruins, and would provided themselves with the means of setting fire to their houses, so that the enemy should become possessthe ashes." Brave worldlings! Brave and humane! Kind feeding, although all the Charlestonians laid in this abundance of fuel.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic—The General Assembly of the new State of Nevada, which met at Carson City in September, assembled, voted unanimously to recommend the ratification of the Constitution of the United States. The discussion was spirited, and after the amendment was carried, the House sang the National anthem in singing "My country, 'tis of thee." The Senate is unanimous.

—Power's celebrated Mask and Statue of Washington has arrived at the late fire in Richmond.

—A gentleman who attended Gen. Joe Johnston, at his home in Charlotte, N. C., last week, reports that he was informed by Gen. J. that the proclamation offering a reward for the capture of Jeff. Davis, Clement C. Clay, &c., was by Andy Johnson's own confession, not thoroughly well, the character of Clement C. Clay, for which fact that he was a party to some conspiracy in regard to the assassination." This is based on the declaration of Gen. Johnson, that the military authorities, instituted by the people of the North, will never retreat that the re-organization of the different 36 Governments of the South shall be effected by the men who have ever been staunch to that the United States from the toll of nations.

—Ex-Governor Letcher, C.S.A., of Tennessee, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and a Kentucky, are all pardoned.

—The Boston Transcript says that Gen. Banks has been ordered to report at Washington, May (the time of the assassination) for the purpose of making a Close investigation.

—At a public meeting recently held at Raleigh, N. C., the following resolution was adopted: "that we accept of Andrew Johnson as a part of the wise and settled situation of affairs, and the acceptance is believed to be the best guarantee that the individual has been made a handle of by the Secession politicians in the days past, and that he is now willing to reconcile the dissensions state of affairs which now exist in the country."

—Gen. Halleck has issued an order directing Congressmen and newspaper men to be allowed to pass between negroes, and to prevent, as far as possible, the recurrence of the disgraceful scene which took place at Richmond when the negroes were welcomed.

PETROLEUM AS AN INVESTMENT.

IN our last number we pointed out the probability that the huge manufacturing industry evolved from the permits of war would tend towards the exercise of skill and energy, rather than to the monotony and drudgery of farming.

And we, further, gave some reasons why such pursuits, besides being more congenial to the returned sailor or soldier, would also be more profitable. Let us look a little more closely into it, and see how this kind of investment compares with others. The average value of the gold mines in California, in the 13 years since their first discovery, is $30,000,000. The value of the entire mines of Petersburg, in the third year of its development, is $40,000,000, and to this must be added the value of what was consumed at home; and the yield is still increasing. But, even some earlier, look at the enormous number of companies which were formed, or are continuing to have organized, for obtaining; can there possibly be any reasonable doubt that, as we advised upon the hundreds of millions of dollars which the published lists tell us are already invested in the enterprise? Certainly not, we reply. You must make an enormous allowance for what you see in print. Sixty out the so-called "reliable companies" in Petersburg, there are at present but 20 paying; merely paying basis, the owners of many have given up all hope of realizing within a certain time, if money can be obtained for them. And during the past week or two the prices of the companies, who own their lands, have risen considerably in the market. But in any manner of doubt concerning a world, and we may add, that without such security and such ample margin we ought to succeed.

We are bound, also, to keep out of view, that the fortunes made by single individuals by striking veins of petroleum are fabulous. The possibility of such a thing lure on many, but a fair return for the time and money expended is the general rule. It is not absolutely, or even least; and the probability of finding this well-stocked region, is shown by its extent, to be very great.

The remarkable article is not worth imitating, and if there were not an actual and substantial value to offer, namely, the oil and its products, we should have discovered the columns of the newspapers, would never secure a dollar. Nothing is more easy than to make a prospectus in no doubt very great; but it is no more reasonable to say you can get rich by it than to say authors because so many are "begun," than to say you would be rich if you could write a book which would be read, or that you would not plant a crop of wheat, because you had a failure last year.

As with all men because exhausted from time to time, and because it is not always the best that succeeds, so with petroleum. Every year it is but small, and must soon be pumped out. So there will, that we state as the truth in Chicago, but there was one day out, the gold in California would be exhausted. Some 20,000,000 tons of petroleum have already been produced, and no signs of exhaustion. Coal mines have been worked out, but it is never found upon upland consequently a new strata, that is almost sure by exhaustion, may be found beneath. Gold is found in the sands and gravels of the United States, and that, some day, may be very scarce, but we shall be past all, and in a what shall we do with our money? Buy land, as the saying is. But the petroleum companies, by their mining, properly conducted, presents no greater risk than any other legitimate business. There may be great prizes, but the chances of these are so small that we can safely leave them out. The profits are to be attained are, first, a favorable location of land; and, secondly, a well managed, but not extravagant and diligent search, the choice Petroleum Company will be the one which has the most favorable land, and the soundness of this plan of action has been proved by the rapidly increasing value of the Oil Creek lots, in consequence of good productive wells having been struck in their vicinity. The public have also learned confidence that the money invested will bring a good return. The Pithole City Company, of Philadelphia, a six Broadway, Brook Leslie, Esq., President, whose all the information we observed given, and chance, if cash, can be obtained.

GEN. SHERMAN AT THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB.

THERE has been a heartiness about the New York reception of the hero of the grandest and most triumphant march in the history of the world that is peculiarly American. Among the honors paid him was the reception to him by the members of the Union League Club. This took place on Saturday evening, when at eight o'clock the main room of the club was filled, and a large crowd was noticed Generals Sherman and Butterfield, Hunt, Cushing, E. S. N. Thomas, Dr. Peter Cooper, Gen. Sherman, Judge Davis, Postmaster Kelly, and about 500 others. The band played a selection of national airs, when

A Committee of Gen. Sherman arrived; he was accompanied by Gen. Meigs. The reception was enthusiastic. Despite his well-known repugnance to speaking, Gen. Sherman was induced to say a few words but he confined himself to complimenting his command, and to thanking his soldiers for their services, after partaking of a bountiful entertainment the party retired after 10 o'clock, P. M.

JEFF. DAVIS EN ROUTE FOR FORTRESS MONROE.

We engrave two sketches, furnished by special correspondent, of a scene in the sad, tragic party, of the miserable traitor's progress towards Fortress Monroe. The wretched and now friendless rebel's strength soon gave out, and within a short distance of the scene of his arrest he was placed in an ambulance, which was the easiest mode. In the new state carriage the ex-president rode alone—"revolving in his mind, and in his heart, the past, the present, and the attentive escort kept a sharp look-out for any enemies that might be lurking in the bushes, or skulking in the woods, and the sleight was ruefully spent by Davis in anxious gaze. The first sketch shows the ambulance occupied a second—the strong force of very soldiers surrounding the party.

FRIGHTFUL EXPLOSION

At Mobile, May 24, 1865.

On the evening of the 24th ult., the main Ordnance Department in Mobile, Ala., exploded, at Mobile, blew up with a terrific explosion.

The shock was felt throughout the city, many wounded. Thousands are buried in the ruins.

A square entire square of the city were demolished, and about 8,000 bales of cotton destroyed.

The steamers Col. Cowles and Kate Dale, with all on board, were entirely destroyed.

A great portion of the Dutchess centre is badly damaged.

The total loss is estimated at $5,000,000.

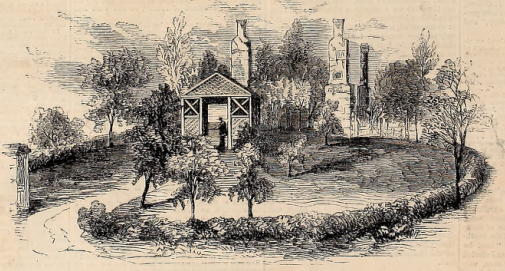
Gen. Granger rendered prompt relief to the sufferers.

The ordnance stores, which were a portion of the munitions of war surrendered by Rich Taylor, were in course of removal when it occurred.

The entire city is more or less injured by the explosion.

The cause of the explosion is uncertain.

JEFFERSON DAVIS EN ROUTE FOR FORTRESS MONROE.—ENTERING AN AMBULANCE NEAR THE SCENE OF HIS ARREST.—FROM A SKETCH FURNISHED BY ONE OF HIS CAPTORS.



LEE'S HEADQUARTERS.

GEN. LEE'S headquarters were about a mile and a half from Petersburg, and were small and incommodious. The hard-pressed rebel had little time for the refinements of housekeeping, and our boys made a number of remarks, more critical than complimentary, on the condition the place was in when they assumed possession.

SHERMAN'S BUMMERS FORAGING.

SHERMAN, our great general, has, like the English general, Wellington, whom in many respects he resembles, given his name to many "articles" to which his nature is most akin—among these is that class of adventurers, which has won immortal renown by preceding his armies.

Our Artist, in sending us the sketch we have published of "Bummers foraging," accompanies it with a graphic account of their modus operandi. He says: "These active and unscrupulous fellows generally start out every morning mounted on very mean horse flesh, and, as a general rule, they always come back very well mounted, with the animals they rode in the morning laden even to breaking down with all the good things of this world. In one place in South Carolina they came to a large plantation, owned by a leading rebel named Fitzgerald—here our soldiers found, buried in various out-of-the-way places, an immense quantity of gold and silver-plate, of the aggregate value of over $70,000—here they also found a large quantity of the finest Madeira wine, which had been stowed away in the old gentleman's wine cellars for nearly 30 years. Indeed, as a general thing, it may be said that our brave fellows had plenty of good old wine to drink in their memorable march through Georgia and South Carolina."

GEN. ROBERT E. LEE'S HEADQUARTERS, NEAR PETERSBURG, VA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, J. E. TAYLOR.

THE hunger for company is keen; it should be discriminating. The great fault of our social custom is, that there is no limit to our calls and visits. To inflict any one with a compulsory interview of more than 10 minutes, indicates a crude state of civilization. Never should a call be prolonged over this limit, unless a request is made by the visited, or permission expressly asked by the visitor.

A PRETTY girl and a wild horse are liable to do much mischief, for the one runs away with a fellow's body, and the other runs away with his heart.

THE LITTLE ONES IN BED.

... now of little faces by the bed—
A row of little hands upon the spread—
A row of little roguish eyes all closed—
A row of little naked feet exposed.

A gentle mother leads them in their praise,
Teaching their feet to tread in heavenly ways,
And takes this lull in childhood's tiny tide,
The little errors of the day to chide.

Then tumbling headlong into waiting beds,
Beneath the sheets they hide their timid heads;
Till slumber steals away their idle fears,
And like a peeping bud each face appears.

All dressed like angels in their gowns of white,
They're wafted to the skies in dreams of night;
And heaven will sparkle in their eyes at morn,
And stolen graces all their ways adorn.

ROSSITOR HOUSE.

CHAPTER I.

WANTED.—In the family of a gentleman, a Governess to superintend the education of a small child. Salary liberal. Address Judge Rossitor, Rossitor House, Black Beach.

That was how the words ran; plain, simple, concise. I have them still—just as they were cut from the columns of a daily journal, and tucked away in a corner of my pocket-book, as something which might possibly insure me the living which it had become a settled fact that I now must earn.

I had been fashionably reared and educated by a relative, deceased. If in life he had pitied my youth and orphanage and poverty, that pity was not made public in the legacies of his will. With my existence ignored in that important document, I found my future narrowing suddenly to this prospect—work for my own maintenance, as became the proud blood and independence of the Darrows, and by-and-by, perhaps, when such an alliance could no longer clog the way of his ambition, a marriage with Grant Wyvil, my betrothed husband. Tame and commonplace enough, was it not?

So it was, that on a dreary twilight, deepening gradually through long rows of gnant poplar trees, and dying down the long hall in a darkness full of vague echoes, I sat at the window in my travelling dress, listening for the first rattle of the carriage in the street below. The purple sweep of the curtain made a black shadow in the recess. Outside the thick white rain fell like sheets of crystals, trickling down the pane and through the bleak pale light, each with a voice of warning, perhaps, if I had thought to listen.

I was to go in the evening boat for Black Beach. I unfolded and read again, there in the lonesome dying day, Judge Rossitor's advertisement for a governess, and also the letter which he had written me, accepting the services which I had tendered as such. Both pleased me. The letter was a model of polite elegance. The salary he offered much exceeded my expectations. Moreover, the Rossitors were old friends of Grant Wyvil, and would be sure to welcome me kindly for his sake. There was no possible reason why I should sit in that dreary window watching the falling rain with the heaviest heart I had ever known, yet I did.

Some one came leaping up the staircase through the shadows, clearing their silence with a snatch of song, that blithe and strong as it was, rang in my ear till this day, like a dirge:

"Oh! I loved in my youth a lady fair,
For her azure eyes and her golden hair;
Oh! truly, oh! truly, I loved her then,
And naught shall I ever so love again,
Save my hawk, and my hound, and my red-roan steed——

ROSSITOR HOUSE.

THE GOVERNESS AND HER PUPIL.

I turned.

"Dame Hubbard," said Wyvil, underhis breath, as I sunking eyes at me, "there's a carriage at the door and a boat at the wharf, and you—what! No you don't—eying?"

"No!" indignantly.

Down splashed a great tear on my betrothal ring.

"Dew for the diamonds!" clasping fast the ring and the hand that wore it. "Little Jessie, you shall not go!"

He had brown eyes, as dark and brilliant as a falcon's. I saw down in their dusk a sudden trouble leap up.

"Not go! and you cloaked, and booted and spurred, and ——"

"Homesick already?" with a grimace.

"Not homesick."

"Flo!"

I held the hand that wore his ring on one broad shoulder, and crossed the other hand upon it.

"But half afraid of my new life, Grant. Tell me about the Rossiters."

He towered above me head and shoulders, flushing suddenly through his tawny skin; then he bent, and with an unspeakably tender gesture, touched his lips to my eyelids.

"There is little enough to tell. The judge is an aristocrat, proud of his blue blood and old estate. For the child, she is a delicate little sprite, you will pet her and she will love you" and Mrs. Rossiter—wife, she is simply a magnificent chattel."

The word came out after a pause, slow and bitter.

"Grant!"

He laughed, but with the flush still on his face.

"Little pet, are you shocked? I call fashionable women so that, more or less. Mrs. Rossiter is a distant cousin of mine. I believe I can afford to abuse my relatives, you know. However, she is my have changed."

"But, Grant——"

"But Ruth——" he mimicked, drawing out his watch.

"Is it time to go?"

"The tide serves in fifteen minutes," curly.

It was a woman's question that came next. I was tying my bonnet before the mirror, and gazing at the reflection there of my own sober face, with its low forehead and pale cheeks.

"Is she—is Mrs. Rossiter handsome, Grant?"

"The handsomest woman I ever saw," gravely.

A subtle pang, so sharp and strange that it frightened me, made me turn to him with a quick gesture.

"Love me, Grant," I cried out.

The brown eyes dilated, he tucked me under his arm with a light laugh.

"Love you! that is good, little pose. Who should I love, pray, if not you? I shall be only about to locate myself within ten miles of Block Beach for your especial delight; as if I did not own it from my window in the country; as if you would not be blessed with a view of my visage every fine day—pshaw, Ruth Darrow!"

I can hear the clear, rollicking voice still, as it rang down the staircase on that night so fraught with fatality. The carriage rolled away from the house that I was never to enter again. I looked back and saw its lamps shining through the rain with a tremulous, uncertain glimmer. Homeshad been, but were no more.

The boat lay at the wharf, outlined like a giant thing in the darkness. At the last moment in its crowded cabin, Grant Wyvil had me good-bye. He tossed back his hair with the petulance of a boy, saying:

"Rossiter will be sure to meet you at the Beach. I wish I could go with you, Ruth, but I am to speak to-night—it would be impossible—hang politics! I will be at Rossiter House to-morrow—good-night little love."

Gay, dashing and talented, with the world already recognizing his name as a rising star in a political horizon, was it wonder that I was proud of this handsome lover of mine? Yet something in his manner—I would hardly tell what—left me sitting lonely and dissatisfied in a throng of figures that I saw, yet did not see, and shrinking at every motion of the boat, pacing upon deck as if my love lay as if it had been some hand laid on an unhealed wound.

It was a dreary night of scudding clouds and rain drifting sharp from the east. Along the distant shores red lights winked tipsily in the mist, each like a cyclop's eye. How the wind wailed across the wide bay! and now and then a frightened young moon shook out of some rift in the dark the storm-rack far to westward, like the face of a ghost. I sat and waited. The storm beat upon the cabin windows, or, lulled for the moment, sighed across them in faint moanings. Leaning back against the wall I listed until both night and sound departed together, and in a swarming and uneasy a position as possible, I think I fell asleep.

The boat neared Block Beach at midnight. Something woke me, either an instinctive perception of the fact, or the friendly jerk of some fellow-passenger. The rain, indeed, had ceased; but the wind like certainly still, and of Block Beach all I can see nothing, save a few low faint outlines, hugging close the black darkness, and a lighthouse star that cast some distance down the shore with its fiery eye glaring redly across the waves.

I stepped upon the landing, one of many. The passengers were crowding out thick and fast; it was singular that among them all my attention should have fastened solely upon one figure standing near by, watching the boat disgorge, tall, stately, with his gray cloak fluttering in the wind.

He was a handsome man, hardly past thirty-five, with a grave face, clear cut, and delicately dark and cavernous. I noticed that the hand which had drawn his cloak together from the wind, gleamed white as a woman's, unjolored, and with a signet diamond flashing upon it in a circle of quivering light.

"This," said I to myself, "is Judge Rossiter."

He advanced one step toward me, only one.

"Miss Darrow?"

I stopped, looked at him long enough to take in the peculiarities that I have described above, and then I bowed.

"Will you take my arm?" he said, quickly, "The carriage is waiting near by. Heavens! what a stilling rabble!"

The tone was as important as if I had been sole queen of crowd and wailing, and storm. I accepted his proffered civility, and the result was that I found it next to impossible to keep pace with his long strides, as he stalked through said "rabble," like one who felt himself master, dragging me after him, quite helpless and unresisting. For there who did not know him, and the contemporting with that deference that is always paid to rank and wealth, my conductor lifted a small brazilian body into the barrier and sprang in after her.

"Drive home!" I heard, sharp and quick to the coachman. Then this autocrat of Black Beach subsided into a corner, shivering under his gray cloak.

I looked from the window and saw that we were bobbing off on a sandy beachroad, with low white cottages passing along on the narrow sweep. Presently, out from the dusk of the corner opposite, come a low laugh, and a voice grown irresistibly smooth and pleasant.

"Perhaps you would like to know who and what I am, Miss Darrow?"

"I think I may guess you."

"Ah? Pardon me, then, for taking such forcible possession of you. The boat was late; I had been willing all Sunday hold you in my arms."

Not feeling particularly sorry, I continued to stare absently from the window.

"Did that speak plain?" said Rossitor, with a shrug of the shoulders.

That was the extent of our conversation during the ride. He sat grim and stately in his corner, and having curled myself into a remarkably small heap in mine, I held fast to the carriage arm-rest, till the carriage, turning through an iron gateway and up an avenue of poplars, warned me that we had reached Rossiter House.

It was an old mansion of gray stone, which had undergone so many alterations with the freaks of succeeding generations that the original style of architecture was now completely lost. It had been the birth-place of many a Rossiter, I afterwards learned, and it were useless to attempt to describe and long, dim galleries, much of the inherent pride and aristocracy of the race.

I was ushered into a room in the west wing, which looked out on the sea. The walls were long and low, panelled in black oak. The floor glittered in its swing-mosaics as a pool of light, with its carpet of velvet tapestry. There were curtains of the same soft emerald tints, sweeping down in long, narrow windows, and a few luxurious chairs, and over everything a sweet, subtle scent of mignonette, lingering, like a mysterious presence. To the day the room had flower in fragrant with all things deadly to me.

Was I servant or guest? The delusion which accepted me as the latter was a very strong one, as I sat in a low, sumptuous chair, drawn up to the fire, several from the old Rossiter plate and Bohemian glass, up a little mantelshelf of the house. Outside, the poplars tapped, in the sweep of the sea-wind, skeleton fingers, against the shutters. The room by half-past eleven, dim wavering, as if they had just stepped from the dusk without, and the grim old pictures, in rows on the wall, seemed staring and frowning fitfully. Presently I looked up, and at the other end of the mantle stood a child.

He had in his arms what at first sight appeared to be a small bundle, wrapped in a gorgeous Indian shawl, and presently I saw that an arm were two three long ringlets of light hair. As the bundle was carefully deposited upon the hearth, however, two large, weird eyes looked out at me curiously, and as it assumed erect proportions, I saw a child of some six or seven years, but so slight and pale as to appear younger, clinging to the judge, half frightened, half-wistful.

"Miss Darrow," and he smiled quietly, "allow me to present my little daughter. Miss Ada Rossiter. The hour is unseasonable; but she was not reconciled to sleep without making your acquaintance."

"I am very glad to see Miss Rossitor," I answered.

The child dropped his hand, and, advancing slowly, put up her small, pale face.

"Kiss me," she said, in a low voice.

The warm lips met mine eagerly.

"Indeed" said Rossitor, still smiling as he looked on, "I am afraid you will be pampering her spoiling lesson to-morrow, or running away on the shore."

The little face contracted. This sole daughter of the house and heart of Rossitor looked at me with large, weird eyes.

"I will not," she said, fretfully. "My throat was sore, and no one came to hear my prayer, and—I wanted to see you."

And I—folded the big palm.

The little hand passed softly down my face.

"She will be pretty as mama," thoughtfully. "but—but—she is sore not like you."

He blushed, but his face grew unspeakably tender.

"And you are sure you will not tear your spelling lessons now?" arching his eyebrows at her.

"Oh, yes!" solemnly.

He laughed.

"Then bid Miss Darrow good-night. She is too tired to begin her duties before to-morrow. Come!"

"Mamma said I was a little one," grieved the child, clasping her arms around his neck, as he lifted her up, "because my throat was sore, and I heard the music and I couldn't sleep."

"Hush!" said Rossitor, pressing her close in the Indian shawl.

She kissed her tiny hand to me from the doorway. Her pale face leaned towards me in the light, his was dark in shadow behind it; then the door closed, and both were gone.

I fell asleep that night listening to the ocean wind howling through the poplars, just outside the stately room which I had been assigned to me. Like all the rooms of Rossitor House, it was long and low, with a dark, slippery, shining floor, unwarped, save for its Persian rugs, and over the mantle of Egyptian marble was painted a scene from Holbein's "Dance of Death." There were fringed hangings of purple satin sweeping around the great bed, and odd black chairs, upholstered with the same material, standing stiff against the walls. It was like sleeping in a chamber, somewhere in the "ewe smal' hours," that I had a vision.

The echoes of the hall clock had not died away in the dusky corners of the House; it was its loud, shrill strokes, I think, which awoke me. At the head of the bed hung, as I said, had torn the shutters asunder, and a long arrowy streak of moonlight, like a ghostly finger, lay white upon the polished floor. Said sheets, grave the purple bed-hangings, wavered and gleamed another light, like that of a lamp, held and shaded by an uncertain hand. The satin bed-curtains were torn aside, and half concealed in its folds, half revealed in that tremulous glow, I saw, with bewildered and half open eyes, the face of a woman.

Never, while I live, shall I forget it. Twas a face more perfect than those of the Greek antiques, set on a pillow of lace, that flowed loosely down her shoulders, and was lost in the purple satin." The head was inclined to one side, classic, ugly mould, and presenting to me its exquisite outlines of wide, waxen forehead and large nose, full mouth, and scarlet lips. You have heard the old story of snake and bird? As all, as fascinated, as helpless, I lay, half-dreaming still, between the folds of this midnight vision—large, almond-shaped eyes they were, fiercely and intensely sad, and, in spite of the golden hair, the cheek must have had color in them for their eyelashes were dark lines. I heard the rustle of the satin, as, with a quick movement, she bent above me, above the hand that held the lamp. Softly rang, lying idly on the counterpane, and then a sigh, so deep, so unspeakably bit or that it might have parted body from soul. Then the curtains fell once sharply fold of the yellow light, and the yellow light faltered and disappeared above the purple hangings, as they swung back into their place without a sound.

I started up with a smothered cry. Something that was like the quick closing of a door jarred the silence; I ran into a room in the hall and tapped upon the panel! I listened. All was as still as the grave. The moonlight and I were alone together.

"I have been dreaming," I said, and fell asleep again.

CHAPTER II.

GRANT WYVIL came next day as he had promised.

I date the commencement of my life at Rossitor House from that morning.

The sunshine like a broken gleame upon the sea, rolling in dark and heavy with the recent storm. In the full fresh wind there was a scent of the near ocean, its brawn, and wild flowers blowing among them, and some dewy roses that grew on the verandah; each hummed its crimson cup of incense, drunk in the sunlight. The house by the town by nestled on its sandy ridges above the long beach, and was old and there a white sail decked the horizon, fading into its blue distance, even as one gazed, like a stately dream.

I had risen early that day. The house was as still as if it had been tenantless. Mrs. Rossitor, the servant said, was indisposed; the judge had gone to his study; and Miss Ada was on the bay, sailing a weird little pupil came creeping down the staircase in her white night-dress an hour after, to say good-morning to me, and was carried back screaming by her French nurserymaid.

There comes to me, as I write, a vision of the fair grave-yard, lying to the west wing of Rossitor House, which had been allotted to me as the place wherein to cultivate poor little Ada Rossitor with the necessary, and which, after day for weeks and months, the task was fulfilled, and she sat beside me, as still as the grave, half buried in an easy chair, her books on the floor, and her solemn little face, sod beyond its years, gazing with large, wistful eyes, out of the window, at the sea and clouds, perhaps, her father, ever quite understood the child, I think. He was her idol; and beyond her love for him she was curiously shy and almost demonstrative. That morning—but here I am brought unconsciously to Grant Wyvil's coming.

The sound of his voice, as he curled up from the verandah and clung in mid-air to the hot sunlight, pale and powdery, like wreaths of faint blue incense. I should have known by the delicate face who it was, lingering thus in the shadow of his own fig-tree, even if I had not seen, now and then, the flutter of a Spanish bandana, pacing out into view, with hands clasped behind him, and receding again, always with that same restless, feverish step. Perhaps I had grown infected. I arose, and went to the window, and looked down the long, sunny vista of poplar trees beyond, toward the motionless sea.

Two figures were advancing up that same vista. One was Rossitor, in his long, grimace, hands, some, and sat ing in his saddle like a centaur. I knew my level. The other a lady, in a black velvet habit, with a cloud of white ostrich plumes fastened in her cap, and streaming behind her in the wind, like a golden serpent, one long tress of pale hair, curling loosely as it floated.

Tramp, tramp, came the horses' feet straight past the west wing. I felt my cheeks burning. He looked up and saw me, lifting his cap with a quick, hot flush. The lady's eyes followed his, and I—I started back from the window, with a cry that was half of astonishment, half of terror, for the deadly-fair face uplifted thus to mine was the one that had looked at me through the purple satin bangings, sad and pale as a spectre's, upon the preceding night.

"Mamma," said Ada, quietly kissing her little hand to the lady.

Grant Wyvil came leaping through the window at a bound, and caught the child gayly in his arms.

"Two lonely little princesses making eyes at the sea. You make an ungracked centre to-day? The mermen will carry you off. Ruth, what is the matter?"

I do not know," with my hands in his.

"You are white as a ghost. Did I frighten you?"

"No. Where is your—where is the lady who was with you?"

"Miss Rossitor?" carelessly. "Oh, you saw her, then—Agnes, the Magnificent, as poor Jack Brynes used to call her. We met on the beach this morning. She has gone to make her toilette, I fancy."

"Such a face—"

"Lovely, isn't it? So are many things that we don't care to handle. The Wyvils are all good-looking, you know," arching his eyebrows; "and she is a cousin, four or five times removed."

"Are you talking about mamma?" said the child, looking at him protectingly grave.

He ruffled his mustache with a shrug.

"Little pitcher, you have large ears. Take me to the shadows and run and feed the chickens."

She opened the pockets of her little French apron, still searching his face with those wonderful eyes.

"What a child!" he said petulantly, turning his back upon her.

"Grant, when last night, Grant," I whispered, touching his arm. The broad brow cleared in a moment.

"Last night? All was as it should have been—a story soon told, little girl. Applause—laurels—a dreadful grievance, and one shy little face missed from the audience. Ruth, what—Ruth, why didn't you marry me a year ago?"

"Grant!"

"Yes, I am a fool—that is candid," turning me to the light. "Do you know, Dame Hubbard, that you are to-day the handsomest woman in Rossitor House—by-and-by, and you in sober gray from head to foot?—come here."

"But I don't care to see any one but you, Grant."

He drew me into the sunshine, smiling down at me.

"The purest, truest, tenderest child a man ever trusted in," he quoted softly, as if to himself, and then kissed me, and, with his hand upon the sill, he fastened it awkwardly in my hair.

"Sweets to the sweet. Bonny brown tresses, I have fondled them, haven't I, getting a kiss in the disorder.

I heard a step behind us—soft, light as a step could be, but still, I heard it.

She stood, framed in the low, dark doorway, like a picture—across Rossitor House. Her size was tall, but her perfect grace of motion, and the imperial carriage of the slender figure, made one forget it. I remember her dress—it was of Persian silk, creamy and trailing in every fold, with the matchless white arms fully revealed in its wide, flowing sleeves, and bare, except for a broad bands of African gold. From her low, waxen forehead, all the magnificent hair had been brushed back and knotted upon the crown, and fastened there by a singular bijou, I thought—a long, slender shaft, like a dagger, with a hilt alive with the subtle blue eyes of a thousand precious gems. The sunshine shot like a streak of fire across it, blending its consistencies in a weird chaos of jewels, and, for a full light, as she crossed the room, and held out a hand to me like snow—as white and as cold.

"If Grant's sake, as well as your own," spoke the low, withering voice, "I should have sought you before. Pardon, me—but it was not late when you arrived last night, and to-day I have been—busy."

She laughed a little as she pronounced the word.

"You have, indeed," said Grant, drily.

She looked at him, scowling over her fan of scarlet feathers. Those languishing eyes! so large, so dark, that I could but think it was for this cause black Anthony flung a world away.

"You will not mind Grant," to me, while her gaze still rested on him, as if she knew his power over. "I have known Mr. Wyvil so long. We have been famous for our family quarrels ever since childhood."

She shrugged his shoulders. The next words were not intended for my ears, but I heard them.

"I have brought my wild rose as a hostage for future conduct. See that you keep her safe or—"

"She is a violet,"

"Let no one seek to transplant her, then."

She turned with a quick shiv to the window. The long, rolling swell of the surf hovered loudly up the cancle to us, and the still fading sunset lay on the horizon and the little fishing boats above the beach.

"It is so dreary here!" she said, under her breath.

"Dreary!" echoed Wyvil, with a touch of sarcasm. "I have heard that when one loved and was beloved, that spot became an Eden."

A flush, as faint as a seashell's, stained the beauty cheeks.

"You should know"—coldly—"you are au fait in such matters."

He winced. The next moment the hall was all in a bustle. The sound of footsteps and fluttering dress threw out a warning. Judge Rossitor himself stood in the doorway, quietly regarding us. The guests of the house were assembling.

From my quiet corner I could watch them unnoticed. I had nothing in common with them. If my presence there was remarked at all, it was by surprise alone, for the abundance of a governese to those drawing-rooms must have been a rare novelty. I feel it. My gray dress looked oddly among their satins, but I took the position assigned me, and asked no questions.

Wyvil was in his element. I was proud and content to watch his triumphs, taking them for my own. In the love of every young girl there is more or less of an undercurrent of hero-worship. He was my hero. Gay, brilliant, fascinating—I had never seen these qualities shine more brightly than on this day. The life of table and company—the keen cynical wit, sounding even where he dazzled, and attracting to him whomsoever he would in the whim of the moment. I was ignored, yes, forgotten for the time, and there was not one in the gay circle, I think, who envied me our relationship. My womanhood might have asserted itself in a brief pang, perhaps, but that was all. I remained quietly in my shawry, musk-like and dusky by a variety of purple damask and the shadow of a poplar tree just outside the window.

Mrs. Rosstior was at the piano, playing. Soon the long length of the drawing-room I could see the flash of the dagger-bill in her magnificent hair—she was a splendid-looking girl. It was an old German love song that she sang—every note brimming with sad, passionate sweetness. Her voice had a certain depth and pathos that I never heard excelled. As she performed air throbbed, sympathetic, to its dreaming, pleading pulsations, there came to me a memory of that old German legend of the Lurlei maids, wafting from the rocks of enchanted whirlpools their syren lays of destruction and death. Wyvil stood at the piano beside her, his face turned partially, his form unmarked. Something like a shudder swelled behind in the alcove—a faint scent of heliotrope, then a whisper, like the sing of a snake.

"Don't you ever hear the story?"

"Not, mademoiselle," gulpy.

"That is odd—it is everywhere known. Wyvil was in love with her years ago—she jilted him for the judge—poor fellow!"

"He thrives upon it."

"To his own heartbreak, of course, like all the rest of his sex!"—a sharper rustling of silk—"I hear that he is engaged now to some little unknown country dab. Isn't she lovely?—"

The whisper died. I sat staring listlessly into space, half dazed by the low, sweeping rolling of straight before me in an opening of the damask, one pale, worn face, that must have been the mirror of my own expression, with its dark, perturbed eyes. Judge Rosstior. Had he heard, too? I shrank back shivering. There was no need. He turned on his chair the next moment and looked in the crowd.

A revulsion of feeling soon came. Poor Grant! Why had he never told me? Could I blame him because he had once loved that gorgeous, goldenhaired woman? How passionate and keen must have been—what must he have suffered! Shall I tell you how beautiful Agnes Rosstior was that day in my memory—how she overtopped the vision to enrapture and bewilder, than a being of common mould? How could Grant, I thought, ever have turned to love me after loving such a woman as this?

He found me in the east room with little Ada Rosstior, my head bent down and my hands clasped me mutely from the door, when he came to his me good-by. It was fast growing dusk, I remember, and the wood-fire blazed low shadows, flushed radiant, triumphant, his ridng whip in his hand.

"Hiding away from me, Dame Richard?—so godly"—touching me with his whip, and let me look at you."

He drew the curtain back, blasting the hand that fell into his own.

"Grant," I said, "I want you to tell me something."

"Do you?"—mockingly.

"Indeed—indeed I do."

"To-day?"

"Did you ever love anyone before me, Grant?" He laughed, taking my face in his two hands.

"Jealous?"

"Please answer."

"My little girl, I am afraid I have loved a great many—more than I deserve. I began at an early age. It was my first step towards jackets. You are my one wee rose culled from a long tract of thorns."

I looked down on the marbles—to Grant's to the young mournful moon, set like a broken ring against the purple tints of the mist, and somehow, but not and yolked down my cheeks.

"Who has been talking nonsense to you?" he said, lightly, after a pause. "Don't weep. I shall drive over to the beach, to-morrow, and take you rowing—you are pale as a Nisbet—good-night."

Gone in a moment. I heard his horses' hoofs clatter ring down the avenue, and I leaned from the window, watching him, till he was out of sight. Over the sandy road, across the ridges, down the long gray beach—he turned at the farthest point, and lifted his cap. Then from the balcony above me some one lifted for a breathing, respected—I might have been a white handkerchief, or a white hand. It flashed through the gray shadows but an instant, and then was gone. I drew back from my watch and closed the window.

CHAPTER III.

A CHARMED place was Rosstior House in the long, sunny summer days following. Its round, rich lawns, its long, long lawn reverently with the tide of gilded human butterflies set in the direction of Black Beach and this hive of honey, flowed and ebbed again, day after day, for a week the sunset autumn. The first to come, the longest to linger, was Grant. We were to be married in the winter, he said. He had told Judge Rosstior—that little chit of an Ada must find another governess—I was growing as thin as a shadow—to which sensitive remarks all my objections availed me nothing.

We were sitting on the shore one afternoon in early September—he stretched at my feet, his hat off, lazy and handsome, sketching in the shelter of my parasol, whose ivory handle he had stuck unceremoniously into a crevice of rock, idle seashore scenes—half-hurried hulks in a reach of gray sand; clusters of black reefs, with dead drowned sailors lying at their base; a ghastly half-moon setting on a low, purple coastline: some weird islands lying dim and distant, with a few pallid, fog-petals flying through a rising mist—a hundred fantastic, dreamy things.

I turned a few loose leaves from his sketchbook, something that all his naiads, mermaids and syrens were the same face, and that one as familiar to me as my own now.

"Grant, you would not picture her half lovely enough, could you?"

"Who?"

"Mrs. Rosstior."

He laughed, gushing.

"I am in earnest."

I touched his arm, pointing down the rocks to a strip of yellow sand, against which a pointed scallop was gently rocking. Judge Rosstior, standing in its bow, tall and dark, flung down an oar that dipped with crystals in the sunlight, and was the first to leap ashore. Directly the boat was rocking empty in the foam, and the rocks swarmed.

"Judge for nicute," said the dreamy voice of Agnes Rosstior, close beside me.

I had seen her coming—I was prepared. Grant looked up, laughing, and stood in the verge of the rock, her dark boating dress looped up, a long white feather flowing from her hat, white, stylish, with no glimmering of color, except a bright scarlet vine that she was trailing listlessly from her right hand.

"Ma belle cousine, shall I sketch you?" asked Grant, lazily.

She shook her head, smiling at me with her beautiful dark eyes.

"There was a step stranded on the shore last night," she said, in the same dreamy voice.

"I saw the wreck as I came across the beach," answered Grant, carelessly.

She gave a slight shivering sigh.

"We rowed down to the point this afternoon. It is terrible. There was a young girl hung in the wreck rowed for her an hour ago. Oh, Grant, what a dreadful death!"

The look of horror in the large eyes, brimming with sudden tears, I shall never forget. It was a strange mood for the mistress of Rosstior House, and spread, in fact, like a contagion over her host, as she stood that day, leaning against the gray, jagged rock, the scarlet vine coiled like a coral snake down her dress, with its singular sadness in her face—she that was a part of all the beauty and life of that wild shore—if its sunshine and haze and gray, wet sands, its thundering and silver sands? Grant sprung up from the rocks, his face clouded, his chin fire almost as pale as his own.

"Agnes!"

She waved him back with a light hand.

"Where it is pretty now. Some one was walking on my grave, I think."

"How can you tell so?"

"Oh, it is quite as easy to talk as to think. There! some one else is calling me. You shall stay here and tell Miss Darrow about the grand Rosstior family ghost, while I go and rave—"

"A precious set of maskers we all are!" muttered Grant, following her down the rocks.

Her dark eyes, with the tears still in them, smiled on me archly.

"Cynic! Hark! Grant, somebody must cure you of this disagreeable disease of yours, by-and-bye. The world is well enough, in its way; so is society at large, if you take it as it comes."

"If, indeed!" he answered, ironically; well, Mrs. Rosstior, will you accept my assistance from this perch?"

I watched them disappear round the rocks together, her grey plume fluttering, and a word and strain of her silver-sad laugh drifted back. I picked up Grant's sketch-book, lying as he had thrown it, at my feet, and replacing the loose leaves, would listlessly turn the pages.

The sun sank lower and lower, reddening a belt of mist behind the distant islands, and the tide was coast line. A fiery, crowd crimson glowed upon the sea. Some fishermen's boats were creeping in from out over, and the solemn sets of the boatmen, dreamy and far off, like music in one's sleep. Still no Grant.

I pressed my face against the lines of the incoming tide began to lash the foot of the rocks on which I sat. A great, red star dashed suddenly from the hills behind some dark gray lodges along the shore—they had lighted its warning lamp. The little wherry still rocked at its moorings, but all the boats, all sounds of gay voices along the beach, except a group of bare-footed fishers' children playing in the sands, had gone.

I sat, looking out over the lonely waste of waters, following now and then, the gleam of some idle sail adown the horizon, or a steamer's heavy smoke shivering over into the west, and the fast increasing damp, and half deafened by the roar of the tide. What could have become of Grant that he should have left me there so long?

I heard a shout from the summit of the rocks just above my head. I looked up and saw Judge Rosstior standing there, looking down at me, curiously.

"What are you sitting there for?" he roared.

Under other circumstances I might have laughed at him. I felt only indignant.

"I was waiting," I began, raising up from my seat, with dignity.

"Child, indeed! and the tide just ready to sweep you off."

My head whirled as I leaned forward and looked over the rocks. The black sea, hissing at me, and flashing its foam full in my face, lay almost even with the shelving ledge on which I stood.

"Give me your hand—quick!" cried Rosstior.

He was leaning above me, braced firmly and leaning down with a stern, displeased face, and one arm extended imperiously.

I scrambled up the rocks, through slow difficulties, and by all the time, the swirling tide advancing swiftly after. He leaned forward still farther, his arm passed around me, like a bar of iron, and I felt myself drawn up to his side. Blue, pinched and shivering, I confronted him.

"Go home now, Miss Darrow, and change your boots," he said, drily.

I was really too much afraid of the man to ask for Grant, but I ventured on a very faint, "Thank you. Mr. Rosstior."

"Wyvil came back to the drawing-room an hour ago. Never sit freezing here again after dinner. Good-night, my unmeltable!"

His eyes were full of conchant scorn. I smarted for the time. Grant was always making me always neglectful, but this was a drop too much. He should know that my patience had its limits, like those of other mortals.

A thorough woman, was I not? for he glided into a neighboring seat at the tea-table that night, with such a pleasing, penitent face that he was quite forgiven, even before he spoke.

"Ruth," in a low whisper, "look at me, won't you? I know I have been barbarous! Confound Rosstior! why did he not tell me that he thought you were still on the shore?"

"He did not tell me, Wyvil find out the fact for himself?" I answered, severely.

"But, my dear child, I did not think you would wait so long, indeed—"

"Oh, certainly not!"

"I really did forget you," naively.

"Greatly flattered."

"Don't quarrel with me—please! Mrs. Rosstior says you are to be Amy Robsart at the masque ball."

"A little mistake. I shall be a mere spectator in my usual 'hodden gray,' instead.

"And disarrange the music for the maskers."

"That depends—"

"You do forgive me?"

"Nonsense! Look at Miss Drummond's bracelets."

Miss Darrow shall wear a pair like them to-morrow," gaily.

I shook my head, smiling. So it ended like all our lovers' quarrels did. Not, just then, however. He did not come next day, but in his place, a dainty shore casket, with a grotesque device carved on its lid, and a bond its way to my dressing table; I had become so used to Grant's oddities that he seldom surprised me now. I opened the casket—there was no mistake. Lead away among other mementoes of that summer, I have them yet, the same as when he gave them, for they were the first—two gay scalp serpents of yellow Arrian gold, their broad flat crests studded red and black with shimmering rubies. As I lifted them from their bed of sunshine how near I to think of Cleopatra and her asp? Every crusted scale flashed at me weirdly; the broad crests seemed endowed for a deadly purpose; the cruel red of the Indian rubies glowed like drops of blood, freshly spilled. I dropped them back on the pearl-powder velvet cushion. My brace bela did not please me. Grant was princely in his gifts. I closed the little casket, and put it away quickly.

A dark, dreary autumn night in the last of September came down on Rosstior Hall at Rosstior House. The sun had gone down hurid and threatening, in a bank of watery western clouds, like wind moaning, and the tide broke at the rocks, and flying along the shore, like an anguished spirit, dird far out in the low marshes and the sea-moors, moaning still in a dreary way that made the heart ache. Half crushing among the purples of my great dark chamber, for the fire-light, I sat listening to the long, loud lamentation of the surf on the beach, and the shrieks of the sea gusts in the corners, as it rushed with them, and wrenches away the dying leaves, tossed them at my pane face, pressed against the dripping glass. Within, I could hear the active notes of preparation, such as doors opening and closing, light footsteps passing through the long passages, a rustling of dresses on the stairs, and presently, a knock at the door, and a summons.

I rose up, smoothed down my hair, twitched my collar into place, and hastened to answer it—that is, I flitted across a narrow gallery, and through a small door opposite, into the dressing-room of Mrs. Rosstior. It might have been a flower-bee one of Grant's naiads, with its sea-green and gold hair, its green and gold dress, and its green shirt with golden bibs; its soft couch, and low chairs, all shining with the same hues in the fire light, and as I stood at the window, sweeping with a marble urn, full of half-withered flowers, the heavy shimmering curtain tassled heavily with gold.

Mrs. Rosstior sat at a little inlaid table before a large mirror, her head bent, her head resting on her hand. She had been writing, I think, for a sealed note lay at her elbow, and the little table was strewn with letters and papers.

She started at my footsteps, and looked up smiling, and I thought—I was almost certain, that her lashes were glimmering over, as with tears.

"First of all, I beg to be pardoned, for sending for you, Miss Darrow," she began, with that sweet easy grace which she knew so well how to assume, "but, as you see, I am late already for this night's ball. I am a little nervous, I think, and fallen ill, and what am I to do?" with the pretty perplexity of a child.

"Shall I help you to dress?" I asked, divining her meaning at once.

"Ah, if you would?" she answered, with that flattering eagerness which implied that I was conferring a great favor. "My dress is very simple you see—a lady abbess—you will not betray me?" archly.

I wondered at his selection it was so grave, so unlike her; but who is accountable for freaks at a fancy ball? A moment after, and I was absorbed in combing out and adorning in the meantime, her long, lustrous, golden hair which curled around my hands, and swept down her sea-green cloak, like floss silk, in the firelight.

"You wear no ornaments?" I asked, quite forgetful, as I fastened its last rich coil.

"And I a lady abbess? No, indeed!" with a quick shiver.

She drew back the curtain of the window, and looked out. The white hand trembled a little.

"What a dismal night!" with her forehead.

"Now, Miss Darrow, if you will help me into this austere dress, and bring my rosary, I will tax your good-nature no longer."

Her cheeks turned forcibly, her eyes shone like stars. Her lips were full of the words seemed reluctant to hide so perfect a face. Her dress itself was of black velvet, sweeping long and heavy from the perfect form; her rosary blood-red, with an antique cornelian cross swinging from it. She held it up in a hattess, unconscious of me in the fire-light.

"Please go now, Miss Darrow," quickly; "they will want you in the drawing-room to play for the dancers. I have kept you too long already."

"Is there nothing more that I can do?"

"Nothing," catching her breath.

And so I went away.

I lingered just long enough in the silence and gloom of my purple chamber to fasten in the lace at my throat a small brooch—the gift of Grant. Then I was ready. In passing the nursery door, I noticed that it stood ajar, and that the lamp within was faintly burning. Had Ada awakened? I hesitated a moment—then pushed it open. Ada was sleeping, sometime fainted by me out into the passage, and disappeared down its darkness. I might never have known what it was, the sudden sense of loneliness and misery that my eyes were caught by something red and shining that clung around it, twisting as it swung a scarlet rosary. Vaguely wondering, I went up to the child. She lay fast asleep on her white pillow; her cheek on her hand; her light curls tossed upon her face. I bent to extract, and soon back, and my hand met a warm wet dew sprinkled adown them here and there. It was a novelty indeed for Mrs. Rosstior to forget her children at all—and more so such a night; and a novelty, also, for the token of her presence to be left behind for her governess.

The first rooms of Rosstior House, in halls, every dark niche, was ablaze with light, as I went down the stairs. There was not a guest there except my own, that had not joined the masquerade. I wondered what the dead and buried ancestors, whose portraits hung in dusky rows in my corner, tête-à-tête with Charlotte Corday; Mark Antony bobbinghing in a free and easy manner with Queen Elizabeth; Sir Walter Raleigh whirling in a gay waltz down the room with Marie Therese; Charles I making love to a pretty Quaker in the shadow of a curtain; Izey Lammermoor chattering like a magpie to Cardinal Woolsey; priests, fortune-tellers, cavaliers, sisters of charity, kings, queens, and fairy peasant girls mixing together in grotesque familiarity, ogling, grimacing, dancing at each other through their glasses. I sat at one piano; at another, far down the room, a cowled monk had taken his station, and was pouring out from his sleeved keys, the maddest, merriest music that ever set feet to walking. Some enchantment possessed the man. His head and hands seemed the sum of like a shot into the manes of a German polka; Robert Bruce and a full jawess fell to dancing a redowa in a corner; an Indian juggler seized upon Rose Bradmardine, and whirled round in a crazy, many waltzes—each master was adapting the melody to his own whim, even a lady abbess came sauntering past, with a scarlet rosary at her girdle, and her arm in that of a tall, cowled monk. A moment after, and the monk's music had ceased. I turned to find his seat at the piano occupied by a flower-girl, and he gone, I know not where.

A spray of heliotrope fell down into my lap from the hand of the cavalier. I recognised him with a little thrill.

"Dieu vous garde!" I heard like a sigh.

"Holy mother! how pourtrayed a gypsy, at the lady abbess' side; "with them that I unfold to thee the mysteries of thy future?"

The lady abbess laid her head, but the cavalier's hand was thrust forth instead.

"Mine, then," lightly, "and see that they proceed right if you would be a bright one."

The gypsy crossed herself over the jewelled hand.

"Ah, the fates foretend! what is here?—

"'There lurks with love,
A deep and darksome treachery.'

The hand dropped.

"Come!" said the lady abbess.

"Many thanks" muttered the cavalier, nodding as he stalked away; "I wise spell, there's a grave gypsy can't wonder watching you. Maybe he would like his mind enlightened on the same subject."

But the monk was like a will-o'-the-wisp in a log, appearing and disappearing with like ease. My heliotrope fell to the floor. I went to recover it—my family during its deadly sweetness. Fans flirted, satins and embroideries brushed against me—it lay crushed underfoot in a breath. Then I looked again, cavalier and lady abbess were no longer to be seen.

A CONVENTMAN once brought a piece of board to an artist, with the request that he would paint upon it St. Christopher as large as life. "Pshaw!" returned the artist, "that board is much too small for that purpose." The countryman looked perplexed at this unexpected answer. "Why," said he, "not look-ee, sir, ye can let his feet hang down over the edge."

AWFUL CALAMITY AT MOBILE, ALA.—SCENE AMONG THE RUINS AFTER THE EXPLOSION OF THE ORDNANCE DEPOT AND MAGAZINE, MAY 25.—FROM A SKETCH BY A CORRESPONDENT.

LOOKING FOR DAY.

BY JENNIE E. GRIFFITH.

Is it almost over—the terrible night?
Is the morning beckoning, serene and white?
May we lift up our faces with one accord,
Secured from his smiting, and thank the Lord?

Since no poems ring out so for victory won,
Since his will had decreed that this thing should be done,
That for ravings like ours and clotted anger, must run—

Awed by his presence, and clothed anew,
With hearts that patice and truth press through,
Lest we break, we bend, we are penitent too!

For our inpions daring what fell price paid,
The lost graves where our dear dead are laid,
Desires for ever from march and from sight!
By the feet of the hosts that swept on in the flight;

And of blooms left torn by the awful fear
That they cured for aid when no aid was near,
Whenever the Lord seemed not to favor?
So is the price of slaves and blood
Lapped by Southern sands, in his sight made good?

Then might not his hared arm be withstood?

Soldiers, return not with trumpet's loud glee,
Thanksgiving, to-day, though the victory be;
Come as we walk from the tombe of our kin,
Grave to observance, and saddened within.

But that nations may know how a foul wrong dies,
Shake out the old flag that from henceforth flies.

An attainable heaven to languishing eyes!
We will put off our weeds for his dear sake alone,
God holds the lost graves till each occupant wakes,
We will welcome you home. Lo! the morning breaks!

CHAPTER XXV.—THE ROAD TO RUIN.

MAUDE TREDETHLYN took her new life very pleasantly. Her father was happy. There had been a reaction in the city; things were going very well for the absolutist incendiaries, and Francis Tredethlyn was receiving handsome interest for his thirty thousand pounds.

He brought these tidings to his wife's mother one morning early in the new year.

"I have good luck to offer you, Mr. Maude," he said; "and now you see that it was a very fine thing for me to get into your father's business. So you must have been uncosy about the matter, my darling."

Mrs. Tredethlyn lifted herself upon tiptoe, and pursed up her sweet lips in Cardinal-snow, a kiss, transient as the passing flutter of a butterfly's wing, alighted somewhere amid the thickets of the Cornishman's beard.

"You dear, good old Francis! That is the pleasantest news I ever heard, except——"

"Except what, darling?"

"The news that pugs brought me home a year ago, when a generous friend stepped in between him and ruin."

Francis Tredethlyn blushed like a school-girl.

"Oh! Frank, if I should ever regret it had day!" said Maude, in a low voice, that had something of sadness in its tone.

Was she thinking that there had been occasions since her marriage when she had almost forgotten how much she owed to the devotion of her lover, occasions on which some little show of love, some small omission or commission, some petty sin against the laws of the Belgravians and Tyburnians, had been bad enough to blot out all memory of her husband's goodness? How can you remember that a man has a noble heart, when, for want of the daily food by which that heart is nourished, gators steer their barks amid the trembled waters of society, he thirsts qut some unlucky allusion to which purgatory is conversantly applied, or an entire dinner-table, and brings blight and ruin down upon an assemblage which had fairly promised to be a success? Or how can you be expected to appreciate the generous spirit of a being whose income has been killed dead by the mauvaise honte timides de gôter into the ruby velvet lap of your most important guest?

There were times when Maude was forgetful of everything except her husband—genial good-nature and undying devotion. There were other times when her heart sank within her, and she saw his candid face beaming at her from the remote end of a long dinner-table, and heard his sonorous laugh quite loud and long above the hushed accompaniment of Belgravia.

He was her slave. If she loved him—as really it was impossible that she could accept so much idolatry, and render no still tribute of affection in return—her love for him was pretty much of the same quality as that which she bestowed on her favorite Skye terrier.

He was such a dear, devoted creature—so unselfish, so obedient; and if he did not quite stand up in a corner to beg, with a bit of bread upon his nose, it was only because he was never required to do so. He was the best of creatures—a big, amiable Newfoundland, ready to lie down in the dirt to be trodden upon by his mistress's pretty slipper, or to fly at the throat of the foe who dared to assail her. He was a faithful slave and defender, and it was very pleasant to know that he was always at hand, to be patted on the head now and then when he was specially good, to be a little neglected when his mistress was absorbed by the agreeable distraction of society, to be blushed for, and even disowned now and then, when his big awkward paws went ruthlessly trampling upon some of the choicest flowers in the conventional flower garden.

He was her slave—her own. He loved her with an idolatrous devotion which she could rarely think of without smiling at his exaggerated estimate of her charms and graces. He was here—so entirely that no possibility of loving him ever entered into her mind. He was hers, and we are apt to be just a little indifferent about the possessions we have forever. Besides, he became a matter of course that her husband should scatter all the measures of affection at her feet, and hold himself richly repaid by the mere fact that her tenderness she might choose to bestow upon him. She had no uneasiness about him—none of those sharp stings of jealousy—those chilling fears of doubt—those foolish and morbid fears which are the distinguishing grace of even the happiest wife. She knew that he had loved her from the very hour of their first meeting, against his will, in despite of all his resolves. She knew that he had been content to stand afar and worship her in utter hopelessness; and having now rewarded his fidelity, she fancied that she had no more to do, except to receive his idolatry, and smile upon him now and then when it pleased her to be gracious.

There was folly, and great presumption in her nature, but she had lived all her life in one narrow circle, and she could not help being unconsciously patronizing in her intercourse with the man who had taken her Majesty's shilling and blacked Harcourt Lowther's boots.

Francis Tredethlyn might perhaps have been entirely satisfied by brightly patronizing smiles and gentle pattings on the head, if he had not been blessed with a friend and adviser, whose life is his chief, always ready to step in with an intelligent suggestion, half-penciled aloft, and a mocking finger pointed, when the poor Cornishman's perception failed to show him the uncomfortable side of the subject.

"What a darling she is!" exclaimed Mr. Tredethlyn, as he left the house with Harcourt Lowther, after the latter had handed him into the staircase all in a flutter of silk and lace, with a flattery bunch of golden hair framed in the last Parisian absurdity in the way of bonnets.

"Mrs. Tredethlyn is just the sort of wife for a man of the world," Harcourt answered, with a slight curve of his well-shaped nostrils. "Of course I can't help fancying sometimes that you're too good a fellow to be thrown away upon the loveliest creature who ever walked from the nursery to the rest of the human race in the remote centre of a continent of inane outlook. Of course I can't for a moment deny that a man who has the choice of crested heiress; but—there is always a 'but,' you know—even if one is a beautiful wife and thirty thousand pounds—I suppose it is natural for a man to quarrel with perfection—I think if I were you I should be tempted to find fault with Mrs. Tredethlyn, I should yearn for something nearer and dearer to me than a fashionable wife."

The figure of speech was peculiar, and painting generally contrived to touch a sore place. Francis Tredethlyn, even when he had been happiest in the society of his beautiful wife, had had a vague sense of chat on bitter truth. She was no nearer to him than of old. The impassable gulf still yawned between them, and he was hardly ever by pretty little courtesies or patronizing smiles.

But, in spite of all inward misgivings, Mr. Tredethlyn repeated the words of his friend, believing the truth of that gentleman's observations.

Harcourt Lowther was quite resigned to a little temporary obscurity. The coup which he went home to the mark it had been shot at and rubbed out, and all discussion of the matter forgotten between the two men; and however firmly Francis might argue with his friend in the day time, he was sure to be overcome by the end of the day like false coin in the pocm, when the rain was pattering on the roofs of the palatial district, not unlikely with a head-ache, and in any case with remedy, and the remedy was—dissipation.

Harcourt Lowther, in whose few years of boyhood he had been cast upon the world in the capacity of a lifetime, was eager to perform the promise he had made to Francis Tredethlyn as soon as possible. He had written to Mr. Maude, and received the tidings of his uncle Oliver's hopeless.

"I was a fool to expect it, poor boy," he said, "and I mean to keep my word. While Mrs. Tredethlyn amuses herself with the usual social distractions, I will endeavor to find out what is never getting any further—you and I will see a world in which life is worth living."

It was a year since Harcourt Lowther had lived away from a home in which he was taught to believe himself unappreciated, and introduced for the first time with the unholy pecuniare into the kingdom of Bohemia.

He entered the mysterious region with considerable reluctance. He had the ignorant pastor's notion of Vice, and fancied that she would show herself in sable undress; but he found her with her most natural face hidden under a plaster mask, modelled from the fair countenance of Virtue. It was sometimes a pretty face, perhaps, for all imitations are so apt to become exaggerations. He found that Bohemia was a kind of Belgravia in disguise. There were the same distinctions of properties, only a little tarnished and faded, the same effects, always considerably overdone, the same jargon, but louder and coarser. Life in Bohemia seemed like a transpontine version of a West-End drama, with cheaper scenery and actors, and a more mysterious audience.

This was the kingdom with whose inner mysteries Harcourt Lowther affected a fashionable familiarity. He was the bosom friend of many of the potentates of the kingdom, and carried him hither and thither to worship at numerous toutemples, whose distinguishing features were the flare of gas-lamps and the popping of champagne corks, invaded with the obscurest senses in the catalogue of wine-growers, and paid for at the highest rate known in the London market.

Perhaps in all his wanderings in the darksome wilderness which his mentor called London life, Francis Tredethlyn's worst eye was the purpled, "standing" of quarrelling wine, and the worst waste of a deal of money lost at unlimited loo or hand hockey, as the case might be. He had high animal spirits and thirty thousand a-year, which common report exaggerated into sixty thousand, and he was the most generous and expansive of Bohemia multiplied into fabulous and incalculable riches, so he met with a very cordial welcome from the magnates of the land. But the descent of Averno, however easy it may be, is a gradual slope, and not a precipitous mountain side, down which a man can be flung headlong by one push from a friendly hand. Francis Tredethlyn yawned in the faces of his bright-eyed sister of the Bohemian hemisphere. His face was reddened against the shallow falsehoods around and about him, and the glare of the gas seemed to have no brilliancy, the illusion upon the dancers' faces was only a much vermilion and crimson lake brought at the cheapest shop, and ghastly to look at in a side light. The laughter had the falsering of spurious coin; the music was out of tune. In all this little world, the realest thing was that of spontaneity, except, perhaps, in the uproarious gaiety of some heroic country squire making a reckless journey through the metropolis, in the property shirt-front kept secured and unbroken for half a dozen centuries, to be squandered on a handful of pearls in Cleopatra's cup, or thrown away on the soups and perfumerie of a modern Lamia.

There was neither bloom nor freshness on any one face within the wide verge of a few pigeons-wing turned i to the haulis of the vulture tribe. Everything else was false, and withered, and faded. The smiles of the women, the friendship of the men, were as spurious as rhubarb Champagnes and gooseberry Moselles, and were bought and sold in the same haunts. Repleseshire may lead his pupil to the Brocken, but he cannot compel the young man to enjoy himself amongst the wicked. You may lead your sly adoptive preceptor into perceiving such small inconvenances as occasional red nice hopping out of the mouths of otherwise handsome young damsels.

Harcourt Lowther found it very hard work to keep Francis Tredethlyn amused, night after night, in the remote and unapproachable regions whose very names were to be spoken in hushed accents over the fourth bottle of Chambertin or Veuve Veuquet in a bachelor's dinner. Poor Frank would rather have been dancing attendance on his wife, and trampling on the silken trains of her flounced skirts in the waltz, or at the drilled "Wednesday," or "Tuesday," or "Saturday," in all the succeed mansions in which Maude's pretty face found constant manors, and his own good old Cornish name and comfortable income had secured his footing. He was very good-natured, and did not know how much bad wine he was called upon to pay for. He could lose a heavy sum at billiards without the faintest contraction of his black eyebrows, or the smallest depression of his lower jaw. But he did not enjoy himself.

He did not enjoy himself—and yet somehow or other he went again and again with the same temples, always under the auspices of his friend Harcourt, and generally very firmly resolved that each visit should be the last. But there was always some excuse for each visit—an appointment with some elegant acquaintance of the vulture tribe, who wanted his revenge at écarté, or a dinner to be given at the rooms at "Star and Garter," in honor of some beautiful Fire-Lance, whose chief fascinations were the possession of a handsome equipage, and a vivacious disregard of Lindley Murray. There was was always some engagement of this kind; and as it happened—and Frank Francis Tredethlyn generally found himself pledged to act as paymaster, it would of course have been very unmanly to desert at the last moment but my friend Lowther and a blank cheque as a substitute for his own presence, he would gladly have done so; but the Cornishman's heart was slow to make the impossible. So the matter always ended in Mr. Tredethlyn finding himself one afternoon on wrong side of midnight, seated at the head of a glittering dinner-table; with the ruins of a sumptuous repast all about him, and the guests only dimly visible athwart a thick and stifling vapor of cigar smoke; while the chimes of some neighboring church were occasionally clashing and clattering of glass, or some applauding hand thumped its owner's approval of the lewd sentiments in an eloquent poor-prading oration.

It is impossible to be perpetually paying for supper, time after time, the accumulated drinking of little too freely of their hobbling vintage. Francis Tredethlyn, under the influence of animating champagne, found the Bohemian a much pleasanter kind of people than when he contemplated them in a dull, gray morning light of sobriety. Harcourt Lowther took care that his friend should pretty generally look at things through a rose-colored medium composed of the juice of the grape, for he found that it was by this means alone that he could retain his hold upon his victim.

So where he might, the Cornishman carried his wife's image in his heart, and he would have left the most brilliant assemblage in Bohemia for a quiet tête-à-tête in Maude's boudoir, if his friend Harcourt had not carefully impressed upon him that his entrance into that pretty little chamber was an intrusion only tolerated by Mrs. Tredethlyn's good nature.

Hence it was that he enter very minutely upon the details of the work which Harcourt Lowther was doing. The art of ruining a well-disposed young man is not a very difficult one; but Mr. Lowther had reduced the art into a science. His great effects were not the sublime hazards of genius, but the calculated results of a carefully studied process. So many nights in a tainted atmosphere; so many "Star and Garter" dinners; so many subtle insinuations of Maude's indifference, must produce such and such an effect. Mr. Lowther doubted more of the simple and vulgar haste with which a meaner man might ruin his friend. He never hurried his work by so much as a single step taken before its time. He never wavered, or reiented, or turned aside even for a moment from the course which he had mapped out for himself. So, in the course of that London season, it became quite a common thing for a cab-driver to bring Mr. Tredethlyn to the gigantic stuccoed mansion which he called his own in the early sunlight of a spring morning. Then there was the time when the returning weather found it no easy matter to open a door with a patent lock-key, which would go meandering impishly over the panel of the door, in a sinuous all manner of eccentric circles and parabolas on the surface, instead of finding its way into the key-hole. There was one still night on which Maude, coming home from some very late assembly, was startled up against by a young man who was groping his way up the great stone staircase, and found to her interable horror, that the young man was apologizing profusely for tearing half a dozen yards of medium from the hem of her skirt, declaring that he was "very sorry," for a "thousand pardons," and "Maury, I" will wear dress d'long, mum' he uprise got tore t' pieces"—was her husband.

A MEMORY.

We walked on the terrace together,
With sighing of roses there came
Faint voices in mellowing moonlight,
Softly repeating her name.

It kindled the night air around her,
And silvered her hair like a light,
And tangled her hair with its jewels,
Till her beauty dazzled my sight.

We walked on the terrace together,
With sighing of roses there came,
And breath of the new Bride of Summer—
In whispers, so softly, her name.

By sweet summer's breath it was echoed,
Through myrtle and roses it came;
Love will remember the moment
How well I remember that name.

CHAPTER XI.—"WHAT! NO TITLE, AFTER ALL!" AN ACTRESS'S FORTUNE.—A SURPRISE!

SIR ARTHUR ARMSTHROP, foaming with rage, left the house of Ella Raymond at a rapid pace, and hurried along the lane, snatching his cane almost angrily, as he did so, from the hands of tender twigs and leaves on the hedges.

When he reached home he paused in, with the intention of going straight up to his own room, but voices in the drawing-room arrested him.

They were those of Lady Armsthrop and Mr. A. Trail, the lawyer.

It was the mention of his own name, in a peculiar way, which had arrested Sir Arthur's progress.

"Arthur is out," said Lady Anne, "so there is no fear of its being here to listen."

"Oh, oh!" thought Sir Arthur; "the old hen is in that direction, does it? Good! then it is time I did listen, mother-mine."

Adjoining the drawing-room was an ante-room, with two doors, the one leading into the aforesaid chamber, the other into the passage.

Sir Arthur opened the latter very gently, so as not to be overheard, and noiselessly opening the door, crouched down near it.

Then he thought he'd do.

"You then, he will sign to-night?" said Mr. F. A. David.

"Yes," replied Lady Anne, "he has become tired of his short provisions, I think, although he is very much in love with Ella, he is too fond of me, before. I will go down to him in a few moments, and see what I can do with him. But first of all tell us papers for him to sign."

"Ah, my lady!" said the lawyer, as he rearranged his papers, and took a pinch of snuff, "something more than a settlement of £5,000 my dear lady, you are very clever, very discreet! Only think of your keeping the fumatic in that subordinate station for years, and Arthur never once suspecting it was his own father!"

"Why, then, is the secret," thought Arthur, as a shudder ran through his frame; "my father is still alive—alive in a living tomb!"

The lawyer spoke again, taking no notice of the lawyer's compliment.

"I have heard, upon good authority, that Sir Edward Guy is in England at the present moment, having with her her child."

The lawyer whistled.

"Whew! that is awkward!"

"Very, unless something is done. I have no doubt I shall get the signature to-night; and when that is obtained, Sir Robert must be ordered hence and taken abroad."

"Good! of course, if this person, the real Lady Armsthrop, were to present herself, and prove her identity, you lose your money and he his title?"

"Of course."

"What!" muttered Arthur, "no title—no fortune—no friends?"

And he hated the mother who was fighting for him.

Mr. F. A. Davit spoke.

"Have you any reason for supposing that Lady Arbuthnot knows or has any inkling whatever of your secret?"

"No; on the contrary, she has no conception of my existence, or of the fact that Robert Arbuthnot has come into a title. She has heard that there is property left in the family, but she is not aware how, or where, to come at it, or at her husband's place of residence."

"Then what do you fear?"

"I fear this: she may, in some way or another, discover the title which fell to her husband, and may then hear of us. If this does not arouse her suspicions, the fact of the secret of my house may do so notwithstanding."

"True. And you wish, therefore, after having obtained his signature, to spirit him away?"

"Yes; and keep up the secret of the outhouse, visiting it daily, as before; so that if any inquiry is made, a search shall be instituted, and nothing found."

She rose as she spoke.

"I shall not be long, Mr. F. A. Davit," she added. "Please wait for me here."

With these words she left the room.

Sir Arthur then took a prudent resolution.

To follow his mother would be useless; for he could not, without betraying himself, enter the outhouse with her.

He therefore resolved to remain where he was until her return, and learn from her own lips her success or failure.

Meanwhile, Lady Arbuthnot proceeded quietly towards the back portion of the premises, and made her way to the outhouse without being observed by any of the servants.

In her hand she bore the dark lantern which she always carried on such occasions, and by the aid of its light she had soon discovered the keyhole, and effected an entrance.

When she stood within the outer door, and was closing it, as usual behind her, a singularity was discernible.

This was, the entire absence of sound within the prisoner's room.

There was usually a scratching sound, as if he were pasting his pictures on the walls; or a rustling of paper, as he cut them out; or a pacing to and fro; or the rattling of fire irons; or, more usually, the dull, monotonous frame of some childish song.

Now, as I have said, there was not the slightest indication of life within.

With trembling hands she unlocked the door, and looked in.

There was no light in the room.

No living being was there.

Sir Robert Arbuthnot had escaped!

She lit the lamp and sat down despairingly.

Sixteen years of cruelty was rendered as nothing. One glimpse of reason had cast away the fruits of a long and painful martyrdom.

It was easy to see where Robert had escaped, for on the table a chair had been placed, and, by standing on this, he had succeeded, by some means, in reaching the place where the skylight had been. The question was, how he had succeeded in removing the slating, and then forcing his way up upon the roof.

Tired with speculating upon the probable manner of his flight, its object, and its result; sick at heart, and terror-stricken, too, by the contemplation of the future, Lady Arbuthnot at length rose, and returned to the drawing-room, where Mr. F. A. Davit, in his easy chair, had nodded off to sleep, and Sir Arthur, in his concealment, was chafing with impatience.

"Mr. F. A. Davit!" cried Lady Anne, abruptly, irritated that he should sleep while her mind was in such a state of turmoil.

The lawyer started and rubbed his eyes.

"Eh, eh, my lady!" he said, fidgeting about with his spectacles; "have you the signature?"

"I have not! He has escaped!"

It required no more than this thoroughly to wake up the before-somnolent attorney.

"Escaped, Lady Arbuthnot!" he cried, "surely you are jesting with me?"

"I am not! I solemnly declare that he has escaped, and that recently!"

The lawyer started up.

"Something must be done!" he said. "Let us send out the servants, and say that a lunatic has escaped! He will soon be discovered."

Lady Anne sat down wearily, an expression of disgust mingling with her disappointment.

"You are the lunatic now, I fancy, Mr. F. A. Davit!" she said. "Do you imagine I shall tell my servants that a lunatic has escaped from my house? Do you think that, after keeping this secret for sixteen years, I would betray it in a moment of fear? No, Mr. F. A. Davit; lawyer, and clever lawyer as you may be, here you are wrong!"

Mr. F. A. Davit quietly sat down again.

"Then what do you propose?" he said.

"Wait a moment, and I will tell you!" she said, and sat down by the fire to think.

Only a few minutes' thought had she; then she turned to her companion with a look of intense satisfaction.

"I have it!" she said, "I have it! Sir Robert Arbuthnot is supposed to have died in Florence—let it still be supposed so! If any one calling himself Sir Robert Arbuthnot makes his appearance now to claim anything, we will dispute his indentity!"

"Good! That is certainly a good plan! I presume confinement and lapse of time have much altered him?"

"So much so, that had I not been near him constantly, I should have denied his identity myself!"

"For the present, then, you will take no active steps in the matter?"

"None whatever! I will watch, and wait!"

"Thank heaven, then, my father will escape!" murmured Sir Arthur, as he crept away from his concealment.

For a moment a feeling of filial love came into his heart, driving away all his selfish thoughts—banishing awhile the remembrance that the escape of his father meant his own loss of title, of money and position.

Just for the time, the young libertine halted on the threshold of crime, and turned his face towards the memories of the past.

CHAPTER XII.—CLARA.

Before narrating the exact method of escape adopted by Sir Robert Arbuthnot, after the accidental using of his wife's name had restored him to reason, I must bring before my readers a character who materially aided in the development of the life drama we are describing.

Clara Arbuthnot was the youngest sister of Sir Arthur.

I have before spoken of Lady Anne and her tall daughters; but Clara was not one of these.

She was scarcely ever included in the description of the family, for she was so quiet, so gentle, so inoffensive, so utterly without the pale of the turmoil of match-making and petty jealousies, that people came to regard her as an outsider, and never thought either of scandalizing her or the reverse.

She was a very different person to either of her sisters.

Rebecca was tall and dark; Barbara was tall and fair; Clara was a medium between the two in color, though not in height.

Her figure was petite, beautifully rounded, with an exquisitely moulded bust and tapering waist, limbs which a Venus might have envied, and delicate hands and feet.

A world of love and tenderness lay in the depths of her glorious blue eyes, and her voice, sweet and low, seemed fitted only to speak words of gentle affection.

Such she was made by nature. Let us now see into what circumstances converted her.

On the evening on which Sir Robert Arbuthnot escaped from his solitary confinement, Clara, finding that her two sisters had retired to their room, that Sir Arthur was out, and that her mother was closeted with her lawyer, concluded, naturally, that she was free from observation.

Upon this idea she proceeded at once to act.

She was dressed, as she usually was in the summer, in a light muslin dress, low in the neck, and displaying the rise of her magnificent bosom.

In spite, however, of the weather, which was somewhat inclement, an east wind blowing sharply, she did not stay to change her dress, but casting a heavy shawl over her shoulders, and putting on her head, over her glossy auburn curls, a pretty hat, she glided down the stairs, and passed out into the road.

The night was dark and heavy, as I have said, and the trees swayed to and fro with a sighing, moaning sound, and the country was bleak and dismal around, and the stars were hidden behind a dense canopy of clouds.

But the beautiful girl was undismayed by the aspect of nature.

Her errand was one in which she saw no harm, and she had no reason, therefore, to regard anything as warning or dismal.

She hurried along eagerly on her secret errand, until, passing beyond the last house on the heath, she approached the corner of the winding lane which joined the high road to London.

Here, just at the turning of the little road, stood a cottage, or rather cabin, built of brick, and thatched, truly, but so unevenly built that it would have been regarded by any chance traveler as a mud-hut.

There was a light in the window of the cottage, and Clara Arbuthnot, entering the small garden, knocked unhesitatingly at the door.

An old woman answered the summons—a queer old woman, about fifty years of age, with one of those young and pleasant faces which seem so out of place when connected with grey hair and a decrepid form.

She welcomed Clara with a smile.

"Is he come?" asked the girl, anxiously.

"No, my dear Miss Arbuthnot, he is not," answered the woman; "but I have no doubt he will be here directly. Come in!"

Clara went in as asked, and the door was closed upon a pleasant little room, furnished in true cottagers' style.

"I have other visitors here," whispered the old woman—Mother Jameson, as she was called in the neighborhood—"they are here by accident almost. You need take no notice of them."

She pointed towards the inner door as she spoke—a door through which the murmur of voices was plainly distinguishable.

The girl flushed.

"I am sorry there is any one here," she said. "They may see and recognise me."

"You need not fear that," returned the old woman, in a low voice. "They are not persons whom you know at all, my dear; and, besides, one of them is ill in bed, and the other is watching by her side."

Mrs. Jameson, as if perfectly satisfied with her explanation, then sat down by the fire, and continued her knitting, which she had interrupted to admit Clara.

Clara, however, was uneasy, and fidgeted upon her chair, and when at length a voice called Mrs. Jameson from within, she arose and peeped in.

The door was left half open, and Clara could see all within.

On the bed lay a woman in the middle age of life, whose pale and somewhat emaciated features still bore the imprese of beauty.

Near her sat an old man, bent and decrepid with age, whose long white hair hung meekly and thinly over his shoulders.

Though his body was thus bowed and borne down by time, however, his eyes burned with an eager, impulsive fire, as if reason had long lain dormant, and had now burst forth with renewed vigor.

The woman was different.

Her eyes seemed dimmed by constant tears—her face and form wasted by long and impatient watchings—her mouth hardened with firm lines, because no smile had wreathed itself for years over her lips.

These two persons were Sir Robert Arbuthnot and his wife, Helen.

Clara little knew who sat there before her, or she would have rushed in, and clasped her father in her arms.

As it was, an instinct of curiosity, not unblended with interest and sympathy, induced her to regard the couple so earnestly, that Dame Jameson saw her as she came back, and closed the door behind her.

"Poor old people!" murmured Clara. "Who are they?"

Dame Jameson was busy at her stocking again, and did not raise her face as she answered:

"It is a man and wife, who have not met for nearly twenty years."

At this moment, a knock at the door interrupted her, and the entrance of a gentleman put an end to all further conversation on the subject.

The new-comer was a young man—perhaps five-and-twenty—with curling black hair, and a black moustache, and black eyes, and a dark skin, and a tall, strongly-built form—as great a contrast as could possibly be conceived to the petite elegance of Clara Arbuthnot's figure.

He was not a pleasant-looking fellow by any means; but then the God of Love is blind, and Clara saw not the man as he was, but as he seemed.

It was strange, indeed, to see how the sarcastic mouth could wreath itself into smiles, and the piercing eyes melt into tenderness, and the stormy face relax into softness, as he glanced down upon the fair young girl who loved him.

Clara nestled up, then, as he came in, as if he were love itself; and the strong man's face was flushed with a glow of pleasure as he stooped to kiss her.

To her heart it was the beginning of a long life of love and joy—these pleasant meetings of an evening with the man she idolized. To others, it seemed too truly the story of the hawk and the dove.

Sitting by the fire, and drawing her down by his side on a chair, he pressed her fondly to him.

"My dear one," he said, "I am come to tell you that I am about to quit England."

A deadly pallor overspread the young girl's face; her bosom heaved heavily, and a suffocating feeling oppressed her heart.

"About to quit England?" she exclaimed.

"Yes, dear one: but I need not go alone."

She knew well what he meant by this, but she did not answer.

He proceeded, drawing her still more closely to him, and looking fondly on her downcast face.

"You have promised me, my dearest, that when I came to claim you, you would be mine. I come to claim you—to-morrow you must fly with me."

"And must it be thus?" she murmured, sadly. "Is there no possible method of making my mother's heart turn towards you?"

The stranger's face flushed deeply.

"No," he cried, "no! The name of Denzil Harcourt is hateful to her. You know well how she received the mention of my name before. It would be madness even to speak of me again. No my dear Clara," he added, "you must trust me wholly, or not at all."

"I do trust you, dear Denzil," she said, "but oh, I dread this flight! I fear so much that I shall be doing a great wrong."

He smiled satirically.

"A great wrong, Clara? The only great wrong you can commit in this matter is to deceive me. However, Clara, what I tell you is correct. I must leave England in one week; and, although I have set my heart on making you my wife, yet, if you refuse to accompany me, I must go alone. We can be married within an hour after you quit home."

"And when do you wish me to come?" asked Clara.

"To-morrow night."

"And will you ask my mother once more, and urge upon her compliance with our wishes?"

"I cannot and will not, dear Clara; it is simply useless. She would turn me with insult from the door. To-morrow, my own one, I will await you here, at nine o'clock in the evening."

She glanced up hurriedly.

"Can we, then, be married at night?" she asked.

"Yes; but it matters not. If you think we shall not be discovered, I will meet you at nine in the morning after to-morrow, in the field just beyond the first stile. Will that suit you better, dear one?"

"Yes, Denzil."

"And you will come?"

Need we say how the interview ended?

Dame Jameson had quitted the room to attend to her other friends, and the lovers had the place to themselves.

So, after a deal of persuasion, and kissing, and coaxing, Clara, amid tears and smiles, consented to meet him, and leave her home.

Then Denzil Harcourt passed out of the house triumphantly, and walked rapidly towards the town.

As he left the cottage, a man who had been watching saw his face.

That man was Gideon Crawleigh.

An eminent judge said to a jury who had passed a sleepless night in their room, unable to agree upon a verdict;

"Gentlemen, I am surprised that you cannot agree in this case. I could agree either way in five minutes."

TOWN GOSSIP.

Sherman has been here, and we have made the most of him. We had no notion of letting him off cheaply, but feted and feasted him until with our attentions we completely routed the gallant General. He was glad to get away on Monday, on our own terms.

Sherman has been the people's pet. The cautious have praised his rashness; the illiterate have read his correspondence: the exacting have condoned his mistakes; the daring have admiringly confessed themselves outdone. Of the two mighty leaders developed by our struggle, Sherman collects the sympathy of the nation, while the silent and mysterious Grant compels their awe. That solemn Trismegistus, who knows everything and tells nothing, and who separates himself from the access of lesser minds in such a blue cloud-land of contemplative tobacco, is looked at askance by most of us, as children pass a dark entry. He wraps himself in thoughts and thunders, and from time to time an oracle comes out from the darkness. We do not understand him until the word is said and the thing is done. But the awful shining sword of Sherman, whirling over the South in the sun, was a spectacle paraded before every eye, and we could watch and criticise and wonder to our heart's content.

So when we found that the hand which had driven that sword was here among us, and in a shakable situation, we New Yorkers gave our whole minds to the duty of struggling through each other's elbows that we might pluck it, if possible, from the parent trunk.

First there was a magnificent private reception on Friday night at the house of his relative, Mr. Scott, where Gens. Dix and Rosecrans contemplated with great amazement their novel vis-a-vie, the Very Rev. Bishop Potter and Dr. Cummings. All coalesced at the supper-table in the friendliest manner, and Sherman's dry wit was the life of the occasion. In the evening there were serenades by the National Guard Band and Grafulla's Seventh Regiment Band, and Sherman with a wry face accepted his most distasteful duty, that of making a speech. These soldiers have been so long in the habit of delegating that service to their artillery, that it is almost impossible to get a word out of them.

On Saturday night Sherman was entertained more terrifically than before, by the Union League. And on Monday the man whom the American monarch delights to honor effected one of his rapid marches out of the city.

On Thursday we all observed a fast. That is we went in a body to the Park, and there and then ate up every oyster, sandwich and ice we could lay our teeth upon. The day was perfect; the grounds crowded with the well-dressed populace of America; the barouches and liveries superb; the gondoliers active; and, on the whole, fasting and humiliation seemed very good things to take.

It has been Yearly Meeting week, and on every side, in these golden afternoons of early June, we have seen the sober and placid platoons of Friends inspecting the town, walking about with chins well elevated and hats firmly set back. We like to meet them, as we would like to meet a breeze from a clover-field. They have cultivated faculties that we know nothing about. To them it is nothing to fight all the elements together, as Achilles combated the deities. Every spring they drop the concerns in which their worldly interest lies, and troop to the city to attend their great Sanhedrim, looking not back to the plough-handles they have left in the furrows. Their co-religionists in town receive them with fine antique hospitality, and at many a heavy-laden board, up and down the city, the innocent pastoral flock might be seen feeding daily, the males with much unnecessary smacking of the lips, and the ewes more quietly, their cap-ears softly shaking over the fodder.

On Monday, the 29th, and Tuesday, the 30th, the Schools of Art at the Cooper Institute held their receptions. There were quantities of paintings in oil and water-colors, and crayons and pencil drawings in still greater profusion. In the female department male portraits, and in the male female, showed that even from these austere cloisters of study and the arts it has been impossible to exclude the tender blind warrior. Faces of ideal beauty on the walls vied with the animated reality which promenaded to the strains of Dodworth's band, stationed in the reading-room. Streamers of the Union colors radiated from the dome, with surrounding festoons of the most tasteful upholstery. On Wednesday the pretty show was all thrown open to the public.

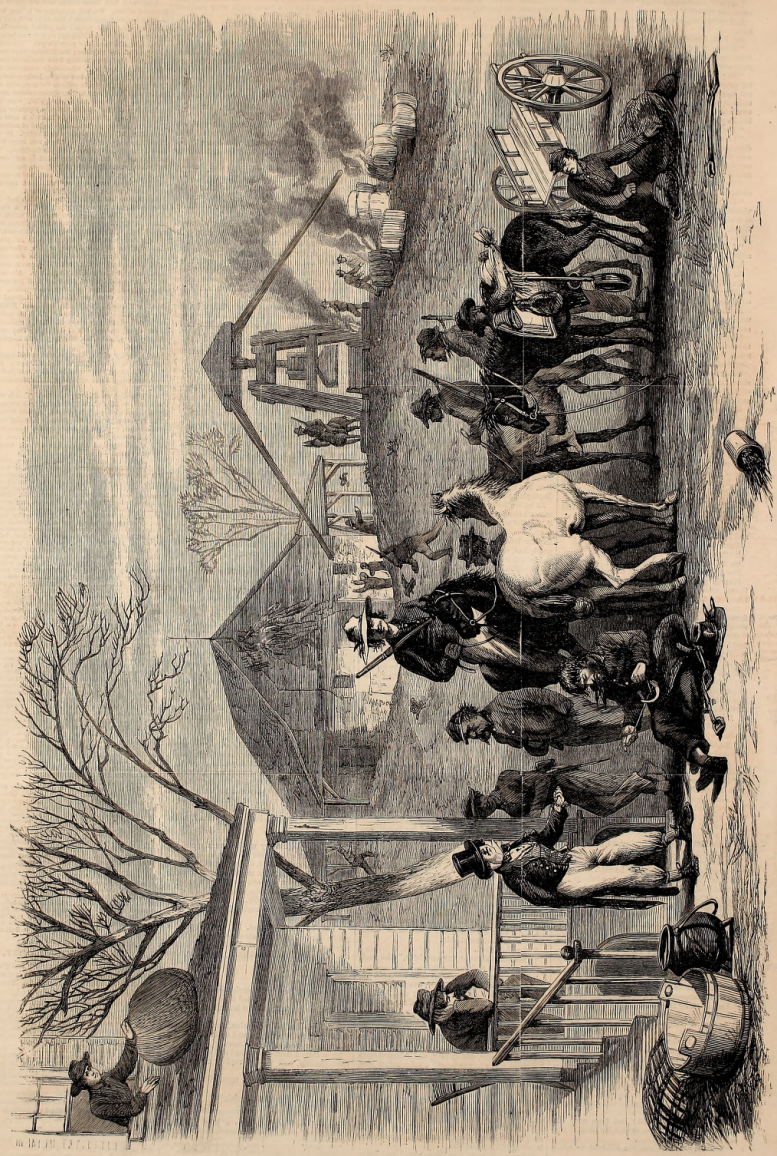
We rejoice to observe that the act passed in March for protecting natural scenery from the defacement of advertising, is going to have some practical effect. Mr. Putnam, of 140 Fifth avenue, entered a complaint the other day against a patent medicine proprietor and a trio of bill-stickers, for advertising on his curbstones and posts, the natural scenery of which had been greatly ravaged by the process; and sensible Justice Dodge held the guilty iconoclasts to answer at court. Would that the Carthagenians who corrode in this way all the rocks they can find over our vast railroad lines could be served in the same manner. There is nothing that so promptly corrects the notion that you are having a good time and have got into the country, as to see these miserable heraldries, dregs of the civilization of the town, blazoned on every rock at either side.

The theatres of New York are suffering from their summer decline, and have mostly gone into spectacle and sensation business. Wallack's, however, keeps up its endless succession of sterling comedies, which the excellent company very efficiently represent.

At the Winter Garden, Miss Hosmer played "Camille" all last week. Her Camille is what they call a "chaste" rendition of that very wilful lady's career, and is as graceful and classic a rendition as can be applied to that highly Frenchy character. Miss Hosmer is stately, graceful, handsome, and has a voice that King Lear himself would have considered an excellent thing.

The San Francisco Minstrels, at Heller's Hall, have had capital success, and they are really a funny set of boys. It does one good to hear manly Billy Birch pour out his "I am Here, Staunch and True!"

Barnum is making the most of the beauty and talents of Miss Emilie Melville, whose Dot is a charming impersonation. The Boone family and Tony Denier contend with the caymans for the affection of the public, and the so-called petrifaction of horseman and snake has not moved, we understand, since we first saw it.



THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The Secretary of the Treasury has published an official statement of the public debt, as it was known to exist on the 1st of the present month. The following are the details:

Total indebtedness	$2,635,205,753
Interest, both in gold and paper	124,033,874
Amount bearing interest in coin	1,108,113,842
Interest	64,480,189
Bearing interest in lawful money	1,053,176,371
Interest	60,158,384
Amount on which interest has ceased	786,270
Amount bearing no interest	472,829,270
Legal tender notes in circulation	659,160,569
Fractional currency	24,667,000
Uncalled-for pay requisitions	40,000,000
Treasury notes over	25,000,000

It thus appears that we have already a debt of over two thousand six hundred and thirty-five millions, with an aggregate interest, in gold and currency, of one hundred and twenty-four millions.

The reason why policemen are never run over is, that they are never in the way.

FUGITIVE SLAVES ESCAPING TO THE PROTECTION OF OUR ARMY AT WILMINGTON—SCENE ON THE CAPE FEAR RIVER.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, JOSEPH BECKER.

SLAVES ESCAPING TO WILMINGTON, N. C.

On this page we see, among the tropical scenery of North Carolina, a little family, of escaping slaves making the best of their way down the tepid waters of Cape Fear River to Wilmington and liberty. Behind are the rice fields near Fayetteville—from which town our Artist went out to sketch—and on either side the low, boggy shores of the Cape Fear. The mother nurses her small piccaninny, the father sturdily paddles along, their poor little canoe or "dug-out" is loaded to the water's edge with their crazy wardrobe and effects. To-day all is suspense, and they listen for the rifle or the bloodhound; to-morrow it is manhood and liberty; next year, perhaps, citizenship and the vote.

FEEDING THE NEEDY AT CHARLESTON, S. C.

It will ever be a great satisfaction to the North that during the long and sanguinary struggle that we have just passed through, whatever may have been the isolated and exceptional excess of individuals, the conduct of the Government at Washington, and of all the military commanders has been dictated by a forbearance which has no parallel in the history of the world. Our Artists have, in their sketches, repeatedly illustrated the fatherly care which Uncle Sam has displayed towards his rebellious and prodigate sons of the South. We give to-day an interesting sketch of a scene at the corner of Calhoun and Lucas streets, in Charleston, S. C., where the Federal authorities had established a depot for feeding the needy and destitute inhabitants of that haughty city.

THE NEEDY INHABITANTS OF CHARLESTON, S. C., BEARING AWAY THEIR RATIONS—SCENE AT THE CORNER OF CALHOUN AND LUCAS STREETS.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, W. T. CRANE.

Our Artist says it is somewhat singular that there are so few of the colored people to be seen here; there are separate days for them, but still the majority are whites.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES.

$230,000,000.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the Seven-Thirty Loan.

These Notes are issued under date of July 15th, 1865 and are payable three years from that date, in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per cent.

GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum, to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest at 7-30 per cent. amounts to

One cent	per	day	on a	$50	note.
Two cents	"	"	"	$100	"
Ten	"	"	"	$500	"
20	"	"	"	$1,000	"
$1	"	"	"	$5,000	"

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already sold, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent. instead of 7 3-10ths in currency. Subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15th, at the time when they subscribe.

The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-thirties will commence on the 1st of June, and will be made promptly and continuously after that date.

The slight change made in the conditions of this Third Series affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalise prices, that purchases made with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is now offered by the Government, and its superior advantages will make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $230,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical PINEAPPLE CIDER

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick, than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

This wonderful Preparation will increase the strength, give vigor and action to the system, and regulate digestion. When taken internally, for pains of all kinds, Bilious Colic, Diarrhea, Diseases of the Throat, Pains in the Chest, Hoarseness, Coughs, Neuralgia, Rheumatic Pains, Dyspepsia, Acidity of the Stomach, etc., etc., its soothing and quieting effect on the system is most astonishing.

Dr. Wilcox, an eminent physician, employed it with great success in treating Fevers, Dyspepsia, Nervous Affections, Loss of Appetite, Weakness, Palpitation of the Heart, Chronic Diarrhea, Colic Dysentery, and Diseases of the Stomach and Bowels. It is also particularly recommended by physicians to delicate females, and as an excellent remedy for Enfeebled Digestion, Want of Appetite, Scrofula, Nephritic Affections, Rheumatism, etc., etc. It never fails to relieve Nervous Tremor, Wakefulness, Disturbed Sleep, etc. American ladies have used this article with great success to heighten their color and beauty. It imparts cheerfulness to the disposition and brilliancy to the complexion. To travellers especially it is of inestimable value, and should be provided as a medicine for every journey in which the water is likely to vary in quality and tendency. Persons residing in any part of the country may adopt it with the utmost confidence as a timely, efficacious remedy.

PRICES:
TEN DOLLAR FOR ONE GALLON.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 167 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Valuable Jewellery, originally intended for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLB AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have resolved upon a Great Gift Apportionment to be divided according to the following regulations:

CERTIFICATES of the various articles are first put into envelopes indiscriminately, sealed up, and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus showing no favoritism.

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

Send 25 Cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for 10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered for them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps. ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, varying in value, and all are offered for $1 each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certificate of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, and are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with the article, which will certainly be worth more than that amount, and may be $50 or $100. An excellent mode this of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, New York City, Feb. 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy of public confidence.—New York Scottish American Journal, June 11, 1864.

We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency for European Manufacturing Jewellery, a large assortment of fashionable and valuable jewellery of the newest patterns. We also noticed a large quantity of silver-plate, and understand that the whole of these newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a novel principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents. We know the firm in question to be a very respectable and thoroughly worthy of public confidence, and recommend our friends to read their advertisement.—New York Albion, Sept. 3, 1864.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co's arrangement, the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he has everything to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. He knows what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—New York Weekly News, Aug. 6, 1864.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, not only filling her own purse, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sold the Certificates, as will be seen from our advertising columns. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged.—New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1864.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewellery and silver-ware. In payment of that advertisement we received several sets of the jewellery advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Lewistown), Aug. 17, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 20 articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.
Over 100,000 Copies Sold
Of Nos. 1 and 3.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more than sixty subscriptions having been received for it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and can easily procure it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, including General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Republican Reaction in Europe.

THE material effect produced by our late war in some parts of Europe is only typical of the relatively grander moral results which it will yet produce—results which we already anticipate. Our war of the Revolution was not the precursor alone of the great French Revolution, but its direct and obvious cause. It enlisted a nation which changed the whole aspect of the world and perhaps gave it, in ideas, principles and popular advancement, its most conspicuous impulse. The re-vindication of the principles of Republicanism in the United States, through means of the most gigantic struggle known in the annals of the human race, must have confirmed those who doubted, and convinced those who scouted the pretension that men may not only govern themselves, but sustain and give permanence to the institutions of their choice. The experiment of Republicanism, before the war, was generally admitted to be a partial success, but the admission was always qualified by the observation that it had never undergone any of the tests which go to prove vitality or permanence. "Only wait until some great shock shall occur, or some difficult problem shall arise in the administration of the government of the United States, and then you will see how this great and gaudy bubble will collapse. Its apparent success is only the result of a wonderful series of concurrent favorable circumstances. It is but a piece of, as yet, unexposed and unexploded quackery—a sham, delusion and snare."

Such have been the criticisms and such the predictions regarding the United States, with which the world has been treated for three quarters of a century. All that our foes could say, all that the devotees of Republicanism could say, was limited to an expression of the belief that the model Republic would be able to withstand all the assaults and survive all the perils to which governments are exposed, and would prove, in its hour of trial, that it had all the elements of strength necessary to its protection from the first, and of triumph over the others.

We have now passed through the experiences and trials. We have been weighed in the balances and tried in the furnace; nor have we been found wanting, but have come out "pure gold" from the fiery ordeal. We have received the last and most effectual blow at the friends of Human Liberty, and have closed the mouths of the prophets of evil.

It is not to be wondered that, since the Spirit of Freedom has secured new life from its triumph here, and has electrified anew its votaries in the old world.

It is no wonder that the peoples of Europe feel a thrill in their veins that the oracles of Liberty speak with a new emphasis and a confidence which they had not before. What can the dynasties of Europe oppose to this spirit, but the world-be dynasties, red-handed and perjured, conjuring with the cant phrase of "Law and Order"—what can these avail against the intelligence of the people? with which every manly heart, beating under smock or blouse, can combat all their devices of government and all their plausible pretexts for the repression of mankind?

The American triumph, gained by such efforts of energy and patience, and such cost of blood and treasure, must react, with tremendous force, in behalf of the cause of which America is the exponent and head. It must be felt in the loyest cottage and in the proudest palace, and must unhesitatingly—say, may speedily be felt in the politics of Europe. Of this the indications are not only strong but numerous. Already it has compelled a change in the policy of France, which is only the suppositions descendant of the great general, and Prince Napoleon, who is more impressed upon his face the proofs of his victorious blood. With a people among which his more powerful relative, or putative relative, would do well to respect, he reminds the French nation of the anthem affirmed to be the United States, and tells it that it is here it must look for an example of progress, material and political, and for a true and advantageous freedom. Already it has begun to apply to word establishing an empire and "balance of power" in Mexico must not only imperil, but change into a deadly and hostile opposition. The cry of alarm from Europe be true, this has led to rupture between the two heads of the house of Bonaparte, which may widen into a split in the family.

One English journal tells us that the news from America "has filled Austria and Germany with the spirit of Transatlantic democracy." The Volks Zeitung (People's Gazette) of Berlin, the Prussian capital, confirms the statement:

"Every Republican in Europe now holds up his head, speaks out bolder; he is not afraid to look at his foes before the most incarnate monarchist; for never, since the commencement of history, did such a victory as has been proved ever less than now. The echo of the liberal press becomes more confident and bolder, while the organs of the aristocracy can hardly suppress their fears and fail to find consolation. The whole of Europe, the home of military despotism, France, too, received her European consciousness—for it is reported from all districts that a new spirit has prevailed the masses since the fall of Richmond, and particularly since the death of Lincoln, and the spirit comes mainly and surely to the front in favor of liberty and against tyranny and barbarism for both worlds, and as fall was the beginning of the downfall of the South."

The proscribed citizens of France resident in Belgium, many of them men who once held high civil and military positions, but now exiled by the perjurer and traitor who holds a temporary lease of power in France, recognize not the dawn, but the full blaze of day in the American war. "The great Republic," they say, in an address to the American nation, "is restored to herself; she will continue the living lesson to the nations—the pledge of the future, the example of the world. * * We, conquered Republicans, salute your victorious Republic; we salute, through you, our recollections—our hopes. We cheer the triumph of your cause, which is ours; we accept your victory as a presage, your success as a promise. The triumph cannot be isolated; gained by one only, it benefits all. Justice cannot chime on one spot without irradiating others."

The same feeling finds expression in a hundred ways. "The reflection," thus runs a private letter, "now in all circles is, that we have accomplished, with our democratic government, results that never could have been accomplished with any other. It is impossible for the governments of Europe to resist the effect of the lessons taught by the United States within the past four years."

Not in words alone is the effect of our triumph made manifest. Already the ports of Europe are crowded with stalwart men and women seeking for a home in the land that has proved itself in war as great as it is in the arts of peace.

A letter from Hamburg tells us that on the 29th of April the throng of emigrants from Mecklenburg was so large that the cars could not run on the railway from Hagenow to Hamburg because necessary. Five thousand emigrants from the different small duchy of Mecklenburg had packed at the former place—all young, fresh and merry people. This number was chiefly recruited from the rich, feudal districts of Mecklenburg and Holstein, where the social and political condition of the people, with the exception of the nobles, is greatly depressed."

The Irish Times swells the evidence which reaches us from every European port. It says: "We believe that, when peace comes between the belligerents, the emigration to America which has hitherto taken place, compared with what will certainly ensue, will be as the leakage of a weir to the opening of a sluice. There is not a city, town or hamlet in Ireland, in which a large proportion of the able bodied population is not determined to emigrate the moment peace is restored."

Peace has come, and the predictions of the Irish Times are more than verified. The Cork Examiner adds to the testimony. It tells that the ports is crowded with emigrants, whose only question is where to go, which they have to submit in obtaining passage to the "Fair Lands of the West." These represent, it adds, "the health and strength of the nation, about to depart from it. Brawny and able-set men, strong and vigorous women—men, albeit, in awkwardly cut frieze and gawkish of gait; women, albeit, decked out in rough homespun, with, perhaps, a bunch of garish finery, demanded by the occasion, added—yet both strong of arm and sound of limb, and doubtless, as Irishmen and Irishwomen, warm of heart, are the chief constituents of this crowd. It is true there are old men and women, and there are children, but the percentage of these is marvellously small."

The question of negro suffrage is the next which the nation will be called upon to solve. It practically resolves itself into whether the loyal men of the South, white and black, shall have the control in the reorganization of those States, or whether the power shall be handed to the traitors who have, "from the force of circumstances," just laid down their arms. Apropos of this point, the Washington Chronicle says:

"The following facts may will be submitted to public consideration. The Declaration of Rights, prefixed to the constitution of Delaware, declared:

"Every freeman, having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, or attachment to the community, hath a right of suffrage."

The Constitution of Maryland provided:

"Every white man, of the age of twenty-one years, having a freehold of fifty acres of land in the county in which he may offer to vote, and residing therein, and all freeman having property in this state above the value of forty pounds current money, and having resided in the county in which they offer to vote one whole year next preceding the election, shall have a right of suffrage in the election of delegates for each county."

The Virginia Declaration of Rights provided:

"All men have sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, and attachment to the community, have the right of suffrage."

The constitution of North Carolina contained this provision:

"All freemen of the age of twenty-one years, who have been inhabitants of any one county within the State twelve months immediately preceding the day of any election, and shall have paid public taxes, shall be entitled to vote for members of the House of Commons for the county in which they reside."

The Constitution of Georgia declared that

"The electors of the members of both branches of the legislature shall be citizens and inhabitants of this state, and shall have attained to the age of twenty-one years, shall have paid all taxes for the year preceding the election, and shall have resided six months within the county."

So far not a word short distinctions on account of color. "All freemen," "every freeman," this is the phrase.

The people voted in Pennsylvania till 1838, in Connecticut they voted till 1857. In New York, original freehold and black stood upon the same ground, the right to vote in both being dependent upon a property qualification. About the year 1821 the constitution of that State abolished all the property test as regards the white man, but left it unrepealed as regards the blacks. That is to say it was a half reform.

Within the memory of men now living, negroes voted regularly in North Carolina and in Tennessee. In the former state, it is related that a wealthy slaveowner secured his election to Congress by setting free a considerable number of his slaves, who went to the polls and voted for him in a body.

In Maryland, colored men voted until 1838. In North Carolina, as we have said, they originally voted. Judge Gaston, in a legal opinion, in 1833, said:

"The very Congress which framed our constitution (the 8 secessionists excepted) was chosen by its electors. That constitution extended the elective franchise to every freeman who had arrived at the age of twenty-one and paid a public tax; and it is a matter of universal notoriety that under it free persons, without regard to color, claimed and exercised the franchise until it was taken from free men of color, a few years since, by our amended constitution."

It was not long ago that "Admiral" Semmes, the individual who commanded the Alabama, but who did ever capture the Kearsarge, wrote his paragraph which follows for the London Morning Herald. It reads well in connection with Kirby Smith's surrender of the entire rebel army in Texas. The sea-dog Semmes (by the way, where is Semmes?) ventilated himself in the Herald in search (letter known as "Sairey Gamp") as follows:

"The State of Texas alone has within her limits all the materials, and is fast getting the appliances for equipping and maintaining armies; and when you reflect that she has been overrun as much territory as the empire of France, and that countless herds of horse and beef cattle wander over her boundless prairies, you can well imagine with what contempt this warlike people regard the insane threat of subjugation. A few articles were driven to narrow across the Mississippi river, we could get the enemy for a century to come in Texas alone."

THE empire of South Carolina, as represented by its fire-eating Governor Magrath, is at present, we are happy to say, the Old Capital prison, Washington. Just before his arrest, the lately truculent embodiment of "all the chivalry" seems to have had a "bad interval." We infer so from his address to the people of the state, from which the following is an extract:

"Let me assure you your condition, awaiting restitution on your part will not make it worse. With an unconquerable spirit of humanity at which I bend, and give the assurance, I urge upon you the resumption of your peaceful pursuits, and the early return of repentance to those changes which may be made in your conditions. Let me say to you in conclusion, I give my pledge to protect: deal resolutely with fruits; look the truth calmly in the face; and, with a firmer bosom, meet with the charity which even misfortune can command, the confident wisdom which prosperity."

A CHARLESTON correspondent of the Tribune says of the prisoner Magrath, late rebel Governor of South Carolina, that

"He has the reputation of being able to throw himself into a passion at will, and is, probably, in short space of time, as any other distinguished man in this state."

THE amounts of cotton, resin and other staples of the South that have come to light since the restoration of peace surpasses all previous estimates. The Vicksburg Herald, of the 28th ult., describes the scene at the Court House in that city: "White with cotton-bales and crammed with wagons," and poetically describes the "broadbacked mules, with their long tails and drowsy gaze, patiently drawing heavy cotton-wagons, passing and repassing our window, from early dawn till late at night, and the drivers making the air weird with their voices shouting the word of command."

It is stated on very good authority that the reactionary government of Guatemala has made application to have that state incorporated in the French Empire of Mexico. The request was seconded by the reactionary government of San Salvador, but the people refused to follow, and the revolution which has been a revolution in that state, which will probably result in restoring to power that enlightened statesman, Gen. Barrios.

THE discussion with regard to Buchanan's responsibility for the rebellion has called up his message, as given to Congress, Dec. 4, 1860, upon the right of the general government to coerce a state. In his last annual message, Mr. Buchanan said:

"The question, fairly stated is, has the Constitution delegated to Congress the power to coerce a state into submission, which is attempting to withdraw, or has actually withdrawn from the Confederacy? I answer that in the affirmative, it must be on the principle that the power has been conferred on Congress to make war on a state. After much serious reflection, I have arrived at a conclusion clear and strong that no such power existed to Congress, nor to any other department of the Federal Government."

It is fortunate for the integrity of the nation that the people of the United States did not share in Buchanan's views. The "Old Public Functionaries" that a nation has not the constitutional right to live has such credit as may come from Mr. Buchanan's endorsement.

THE Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Times, of Saturday, makes the following suggestions as to the disposition of the building in which the President was assassinated:

"In 1800, when the Duke de Berry, brother of the Prince who was assassinated in Paris at the door of the Opera House, was murdered, the citizens and authorities of Paris made the ground for ever afterwards free from any habitation. Around the Duke's Tower, as it stands to-day in the Rue Richelieu, with its beautiful garden and fountain, there is a space where the Opera House stood. Why does not the Federal Government in like manner purchase and demolish the house, and erect on the site either a monument, a statue, a fountain or a chapel? I make the suggestion of that description, as it would be in the place if there be money enough in the treasury to indemnify Mr. Seward."

A PETITION signed by upwards of 200 colored citizens of South Carolina has been sent to President Johnson. In it the signers say:

"As you were once a citizen of South Carolina, we feel that you will remember that up to 1835 free colored men voted in this State, before the Constitution was changed to exclude them from the polls. It seems to us that men who are willing on the field of battle to carry the musket and wear the gray of grape cannot be be permitted to carry the ballot, which is certainly a less dangerous exercise of denying the elective franchise to men who have been faithful to the Government, while it freely admits to men who have just returned from four years' fighting against it."

WHEN Jeff. Davis became Pierce's Secretary of War his antecedents attracted some attention. One who knew him at West Point stated:

"Col. Davis was distinguished for nothing as a student at West Point, except in being at the foot of his class in the department of rhetoric and moral philosophy, which constitutes the literary portion of the course. In mathematics and natural philosophy he was little below, being in the former the 37th and in the latter the 39th in his class, which numbered 52 graduates."

The London News noticing his arrest says of him:

"Not only did he plan this war, but on him rests the chief responsibility of continuing it months and years after the hopes of success had passed away. From what Lee and Johnston and Hardee have stated since the fall of the Confederacy it is now clear that Mr. Davis prolonged the war after his best generals had urged him to make peace. If he were answerable for nothing worse than the great sacrifice of life caused by the rejection of Mr. Lincoln's proposals at Hampton Roads, the weight of such a load of responsibility might well break down the stoutest heart. His language and acts during the nine months preceding his flight from Richmond sufficiently disclosed the ruin of his hopes. Until then a habit of self-restraint had concealed to a great extent his real character.

"But from the time he visited Georgia, after the fall of Atlanta, and called Gov. Brown a scoundrel in public speech, down to the address of March last, in which he referred to Grant and Sherman as spaniels whom he would whip, the coarseness of the man's nature has been apparent. It was about the time of the reckless Macon speech that he began to authorize those atrocious outrages, which have made it less difficult to believe in his complicity with the plot which resulted in Mr. Lincoln's death."

The London Times doesn't want Davis hanged, but does not regard him, by any means, as merely an unsuccessful Washington:

"The inhabitants of these islands have little reason to sympathize with Mr. Jefferson Davis. He is known to us as one of the most inveterate calumniators of this country, whose policy it was to stir up the feelings of every class of his countrymen against us. We also remember him as the author and originator of the famous Mississippi scheme of repudiation. His plan of rebellion was founded on the idea that the deprivation of cotton would be intolerable, and that, driven by hard necessity, we should feel ourselves compelled to support the South with the whole force of the Empire. For the person who can thus speculate as his means of success on the miseries he can inflict on his neighbors we have little respect, and if we plead for the life of Mr. Jefferson Davis it is not from any esteem for his motives or sympathy with his character."

The London Herald, after calling Mr. Johnson a "drunken blackguard," whom "the American people after the fashion of an ignorant African tribe have chosen their ruler," proceeds to eulogise Davis, and to prophesy:

"Whatever fate his enemies may prepare for him, he will meet it, doubtless, with the courage which has sustained him during the trying, but glorious, years of his Presidency. He has done his duty. He has defended the cause of freedom and of right with almost superhuman energy; and having seen the noblest of his countrymen lay down their lives for that cause, sacrifice themselves in the hope and the trust that their country would be successful in her fight, now that the struggle is seemingly over, and the South has sunk into despair, he must rather desire to seal his testimony with his blood. To such a man there must be something inspirating and consoling in the prospect of such a death. His blood, he will feel assured, will not flow in vain. Broken as may now be the strength, crushed as may now be the spirit of the South, the spirit is not dead; the strength will be recovered, and the cruel martyrdom of its great chief, kindling it to revenge, will keep alive the love of liberty until the hour comes in which to renew the fight, which for a race of freemen can only finally end with victory."

The total national indebtedness of Mexico exceeds $317,000,000; the interest payable on this amounts to $20,000,000; the entire revenue of the country, from all ordinary sources, is much below $10,000,000, or half the interest on the debt, without leaving a single dollar to maintain the government and support the army. These facts show a condition of financial affairs in Mexico to which, for feebleness and instability, a parallel can no where be found. Such a condition can have only one result—a speedy dissolution of the mushroom empire, and an early return of the Archduke Maximilian to his amiable relations and affectionate friends in Austria. The "empire" cannot stand. The point most to be wondered at is, Napoleon's having allowed any of his subjects to trust their money in the lottery loan for $50,000,000 just subscribed for, chiefly in Paris. He has not guaranteed, however, that the interest on this new loan will be paid.

Two weeks before Kirby Smith surrendered his army of cotton robbers and speculators in Texas, his lieutenant, Magruder, addressed the aforesaid army as follows:

"Come what may I shall stand by my country, and I will never be a slave to Yankee power. I had rather be a Camanche Indian chief than bow the knee to Yankeedom. I will only add that we have a neighbor near at hand. I do not feel at liberty to say anything further concerning the matter at present. But it may be that we may have aid from a source unexpected, and at a time when we least dream of it. Therefore let us stand by our leaders and all will yet be well. I do not feel at all discouraged at the present position of matters, and I am certain you would not if you realized all the facts which will develop themselves."

The infallibility of reporters is beautifully illustrated in the following three distinct reports of the speech (if speech it may be called) of Gen. Sherman at the Union League Club, on the occasion of his recent visit:

No. 1.—"I think no feeling so kindly to the heart as the welcome home of a single tie, and when welcomed to this home by the men I see before me, it is doubly, trebly dear to my feelings."

No. 2.—"I know of no feeling so kindly to the heart of the soldier as a welcome home by his fellow-citizens, and to be welcomed to this home by the men I see before me is doubly, trebly dear to my feelings."

No. 3.—I know of no feeling so kindly to the heart as the welcome home by a little child; but when welcomed to this home by the men I see before me, it is doubly, trebly dear to my feelings."

The Congressional Committee on the conduct of the war has entirely exhonerated Gen. Hooker from the charge of drunkenness during the battle of Chancellorsville. In concluding their report on his case, they say:

"Nor can the committee doubt that had Gen. Hooker been clothed with the power at once conferred upon his successor, and had been given the assistance which was so freely accorded to him, the result of the campaign would have been far more decisive than it was. Why the General-in-Chief should have shown more desire to co-operate with and assist the one commander than the other, perhaps involves questions of motives and feelings which your committee refrain from commenting upon."

The Count de Paris, grandson of Louis Philippe and present head of the Orleans family, has written a letter to Hon. Charles Sumner on the death of President Lincoln, from which we make an extract:

"Those who saw Mr. Lincoln during that great ordeal when everything seemed to conspire against the salvation of the Republic, will never forget the honest man who, without personal ambition, always supported by a strong perception of his duties, deserved to be called emphatically a great citizen. And when the dreadful crisis during which he presided over the destinies of America will belong to history, when its bloody track will disappear under the rapid growth of an invigorated nation and a regenerated community, people will only remember its beneficial results, the destruction of slavery, the preservation of free institutions, and will ever associate with them the name of Mr. Lincoln. In this struggle with slavery his name will remain illustrious among those of the indefatigable apostles who fought before him and who will achieve his work. But it will also be said of him that he secured the preservation of the Union through a tremendous civil war, without ceasing to respect the authority of the law and the liberty of his fellow-citizens; that in the hour of trial, he was the Chief Magistrate of a people who knew how to seek in the fullest use of the broadest liberties the spring of national endurance and energy."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The State debt of New Hampshire is $3,978,000. She has furnished 33,427 men in the war for the Union, of whom 5,818 have fallen, and 11,039 been permanently disabled.

—— The present indications are that Lake Superior travel will be something unprecedented this year. People seem to be just realising the beauties of this delightful region.

—— Duff Green, the notorious Washingtonian, has returned from the South, and is an applicant for a special pardon before the President, his property being over $20,000.

—— The Union Hotel, at Saratoga, will be opened to the public on the 15th inst. From present appearances, this place will be more crowded than last year, nearly every room having been engaged. The opera-house will be opened by the Lelands on the 1st of July.

—— General Hartwell, commanding at Orangeburg, S. C., has issued the following order, addressed "To the Colored People: You know that you are free and are to be treated like free men and women; but there is no one to support you and your families besides yourselves, and any arrangements you can make with people who will treat you kindly and pay you for your work will be the best thing you can do. The bargains that you make to work for a share of the crops will be kept. You cannot be sent to Charleston; and if you went there you could find nothing to do to get a living. No one will be allowed to abuse you or treat you like slaves; and you will not be allowed to take what does not belong to you; and you had better make a bargain for work as soon as you can."

—— A South Carolina correspondent of a daily contemporary draws the following picture of the population of that state: "The hopeless apathy of the poor whites, which is described by officers and refugees as something appalling, renders the planters disposed to do the best they can with the blacks; but there are large numbers who evidently intend to do as the Jamaica planters did—swindle the freed slaves under any and every pretext. Their conversation shows it. Unless all South Carolina is garrisoned by anti-slavery troops, this state will either become a desert by the desertion of the laborers or pass into other hands. It is very desirable, for the good of all parties, that it should change owners, for the planter, that he may learn to work for his own living; for the black, that he may become an honest laborer, which under the present capitalists he has no inducement to become; for the poor white that he may have and see an opportunity to rise in the social scale. No man in the North, who has not lived among these planters, can understand what a brutal and vicious class of persons they are. The New York Five Points could turn out at random a more intellectual, and as moral-looking a delegation any day as I have seen here in conference with General Hartwell."

—— No reply has yet been received to the formal demand of our Government for the surrender of the rebel ram Stonewall, as the Cuban authorities must, of course, refer the question to the Spanish government at Madrid and await instructions.

—— The New York Herald states that the cost of its war correspondence, during the past four years, was over half a million dollars.

—— Railroad men have long sought for some plan of carrying butter in summer, without damage. At last a car has been invented which will meet the desired end. They have an inside lining of inch board, placed three inches from the outside covering; the space between is packed with sawdust, making five inches in thickness for the ends, roof and sides of the cars, entirely protecting the contents from heat in the warmest weather. The doors are also double.

—— Among Mr. Lincoln's papers has been found a package of letters, in his own handwriting, "Assassination letters."

—— Decora, a famous Winnebago chief, died recently at Lincoln, Wisconsin, aged 133 years. He aided the United States in the Black Hawk war, and was rewarded by Gen. Jackson with a small United States flag. He kept it as long as he lived, and now it waves over his grave.

—— It is alleged that the terrible calamity at Mobile, by which 500 persons are reported to have lost their lives, was the work of rebel incendiaries, and the military authorities are blamed for allowing such a quantity of powder as to blow up eight blocks of houses, to remain in the heart of a great city.

—— Old engravings are pressed into service to commemorate Mr. Lincoln. An old picture of Calhoun and another of Fremont have received new heads and are doing duty.

—— George D. Prentice says that he heard rebel leaders say unreservedly in Richmond last December, when Jeff Davis' health was very bad, that, if he should die, assassination would be resorted to as a means of preventing Stephens from being President.

—— The Hartford Post says a gentleman in that city has five nephews in the army who have served out a three years' enlistment and promised them $5,000 each if they would re-enlist, which all of them did. Three of them are in Sherman's army and will be home within a very few days, and he is prepared to pay down $15,000 to them, and $10,000 to the other two, whose term of service will expire the coming fall.

—— The Wheeling Register says a novel suit will come before the Brooke county Circuit Court at its next session. A Mrs. O'Brien, whose husband was killed to one of the West Virginia regiments, sues Mr. James Palmer for $5,000 damage for the injury she has sustained by the death of her husband. She claims that Palmer was a sympathizer with the South, and contends that he should therefore be held accountable to the extent of $5,000 for the death of her husband.

—— The government has under advisement the question of colonizing all the Indian tribes between Minnesota and Iowa and the Rocky Mountains, in a reservation somewhere on the northern border of Montana and Dacota with the British possessions adjoining as unlimited hunting grounds.

—— The soldiers in the grand review at Washington, if marshaled 30 abreast in solid column, would exceed 42 miles.

—— The New York Tribune, in an article on Mr. Wendell Phillips, says: "But for his misfortune in having received his moral and religious training from a Bible wherefrom the 13th chapter of I. Corinthians was unaccountably omitted, he might have taken rank among the very foremost men of our age."

—— At a Union meeting held in Guntersville, Marshall county, Alabama, on the 16th of May, Major A. C. Baird, late of the rebel army, made the following speech: "We have met to bury the tomahawk—to smoke the calumet of peace. All of us ought to reverence that government which we could not destroy, and to which we have been compelled to submit. I shall do it cheerfully."

Foreign.—A drunken soldier in the army in India, having been confined in the blackhole for intoxication, felt something crawling over him. Knowing it to be a serpent, and fearing its deadly bite, he kept quite still, while the reptile crawled inside of his jacket and coiled himself up for a nap. When the guard came to release him some hours after, a snake—a cobra—quickly glided away. The guard noticed with surprise that the prisoner's hair had turned white, and he died a few hours after telling his story.

—— A fearful scene at an execution in Athens, Greece, recently took place. The condemned man, on arriving at the scaffold, appeared to feel awaken in him an instinctive clinging to life, and having his hands free (as permitted by the Greek law), he suddenly felled one of the two executioners to the ground. The second at once drew a poignard and plunged it into the breast of the criminal, who still continued to make a violent resistance. The man's arms were at length bound, and his head laid on the sliding plank, but in consequence of his violently moving, the blade of the guillotine fell only on his shoulder. A second attempt severed the head from the body.

—— The London Standard says:—"There is no question but that the Federal Government is urgently pressing upon that of England its demand for compensation for the captures made by the Confederate cruisers." Now this is nothing new. The United States Government, there is every reason to believe, has regularly sent a bill to the British Government for each new depredation of this pirate, and it was as regularly filed away in the archives of the foreign office.

—— The Pungolo, of Milan, publishes an explanation of the miracle of the statue of the Magdalen, which stands in one of the most populous suburbs of that city, and which was in the habit of weeping from time to time on account of the impieties of the day. The authorities having caused the statue, formed of baked clay, to be examined, discovered in its interior a reservoir for water, intended to be heated. Whenever the clergy wished to make the Magdalen weep, they had a fire lighted beneath the reservoir, which caused the hot water to evaporate and rise into the upper parts of the statue, and the steam there being condensed, was directed towards the eyes by means of pipes.

—— A Paris correspondent writes: "Last Thursday I saw one bonnet which I am sure must be the extreme of the present fashion. Madame De Z——'s bonnet consisted of two ounces of gold beaten into a band, and four square inches of black lace, the whole to conclude with a gold button, which fastened one end of the lace over the other. Just then come by the Marquis De T——, the greatest Anglo-maniac in France. 'Marquis, did you ever see nothing?' 'Nothing, my good boy—how see nothing?' 'Then come and look at one of your countrywomen's bonnets?'"

TOWN GOSSIP.

They have been having a terribly hot affair up in the heavens, and of course the consequences fall upon the poor little earth, which being in the subordinate position always gets the worst of it. Phaeton has got the reins again, and driven his weak-minded father's coach ever so many miles nearer our world, which has been perching and cracking for a week. The track of the blazing chariot appears to us to have been directly over Broadway. Everybody goes home now-a-days and finds his wife gymnasticating with a fan. Everybody's wife says, "Oh, dear, how hot it is!" Everybody responds to this safe ejaculation "Indeed it might be cooler," and everybody's wife retorts sharply "Yes, but it ain't!" and the conversation closes with the exit of the stricken husband into the bath-room.

The coolest people we know are Mr. and Mrs. Swan, and their relatives, the distinguished Swan family. We met them recently at a fashionable watering place, and we were greatly struck by the strength and dignity of Mr. Swan and the graceful gait and exquisite blonde complexion of Mrs. Swan. You should just see her come swimming into a place through a crowd!

These lordly creatures, the aristocracy of the Central Park, completely color the expanse of the lake, resembling lily pods as they repose together on the blue. In the little coves and bays you occasionally find a misanthropical solitary, circulating alone among the flowers, and apparently engaged in composing its own death-ode. These exclusive Timons have a rapt and inspired look. But where the magnificent birds congregate in a sort of galaxy, you may consider them as a race of moving flowers, "finding in beauty their excuse for being." Every attitude of grace is seen in the carriage of the head and the pliant neck. A large swan floating towards you with its great deep wings disheveled, and the head bent away back until half lost in the milky foliage they carry, is one of the most perfect examples of the otium cum dignitate in existence. Often they will rouse themselves into frolicsome action, and their play is very imposing. You may see one come rushing along, quite out of the water, his enormous fans beating the air, and his black feet rapidly running upon the lake, which they agitate like a steamboat. Over a rod will they go, buzzing and clamoring in their unnatural elevation, and finally with a long slide launch themselves into the whirling water again, the whole feat reminding one of the career of a large rocket. In another mood your swan will pass for an hour with an easy slide over his own mirrored reflection, the sails half drooping, and the head idly swinging upon its arrowy ivory mast, whose height is redoubled by the dipping image below. Then, perhaps, the creature will sink its whole neck beneath the surface for many minutes, lying half-blown upon the water like a gigantic lily-bud.

We wonder with what feelings the great general beheld those garden fields of peace, after all the marred and blasted acres of Virginia!

We hope that they neither taught him a lesson, nor pointed a contrast, nor inculcated a moral, nor inspired a sentiment, nor afflicted the honest warrior with any agitation of that sort, but simply cooled him with their breezes and shaded him with their groves, without giving him the additional bother of thinking how he could turn a smart reflection on the subject.

As for his previous "ovation," as the enthusiasts term it, all we have to say is, that we hope we shall never be famous at such an expense.

Fancy getting the hand shaken, till the ordeal develops the wrist to the size of a figurante's ankle; meanwhile listening or replying to a succession of gentlemen who have come up with prepared epigrams, and continuing the pleasing process until the time comes for a dinner, which is quite as much speeches as victuals! Is glory worth all this? Meantime—

"The capture of Mr. Jefferson Davis will be considered an unmixed misfortune by every thoughtful American, and by every friend of America." Thus says the Saturday Review on receipt of the news. To a portion of the British press, for the present, the dead-and-gone functionary of a lost cause is still decorated with some little prestige of importance—is still "Mr.," and wears, instead of the practical and convenient water-proof goods in which he was captured, the livery of a lately supreme civil and military dictator. Not an English sheet deigns to believe that he actually enveloped his limbs in those serviceable weeds of state, or that his mind had been brought down by harassment and neuralgia, to the point of scolding, at the want of magnanimity of his captors.

The singular and unintelligent disbelief of American news, when it has not happened to meet the previously conceived British idea, will be unintelligible to the next age. With what astounded eyes will the succeeding generation of Englishmen—necessarily men of a wider cultivation than their fathers—review the course of their native press during the crucial struggle of the nineteenth century! Not only in its suppression or distortion of the most reasonable facts, but in its massive and shameless ignorance, its lack of historic and geographic culture, paraded openly, or half concealed under the baldest platitudes, has the indoctrinator of British opinion covered itself from day to day with deeper and deeper shame for the admiration of posterity. As to its fancies about the expediency of capturing Jefferson Davis or no, they are in the highest degree uninteresting to us, the embarrassment of the situation resting compactly upon that individual himself.

A vicious and deprecable habit has been springing up and strengthening itself of late in New York and other places; it is the trick of interrupting public speakers and endeavoring to make those gentlemen change oration into debate. At the speech of Gerrit Smith, on Thursday night, he was constantly stopped by persons who had come with elaborate questions on matters of the gravest import, which they proposed to have answered by the lecturer at a moment's notice. Now this thing should be understood in advance. If orators appear before their audiences on that basis, they will indeed learn to respond easily and fluently to the demands of their interlocutors, and many will gain immense temporary fame by a display of combative skill under such circumstances. But the habit of severe and consistent argument will cease. There will be no more measured Tullian utterances, fit for posterity. A great oration is an orderly sequence of arguments, persuasions and illustrations, and no suggester from among the hearers will be likely to hit upon thoughts which will flow on easily into the course of the discourse. We shall have more and more of the accidental, or George Francis Train rhapsody, in place of the classical perfection of the great orators who are now either dead or dying out.

Among the most interesting souvenirs of the great rebellion are the photographic views of Southern battle-fields and other scenes upon which the war has left its imprint. We must not forget that the hand of progress is beginning even now to sweep away with inconceivable rapidity the traces of rebellion, and that in a very short time there will be no record upon the face of the Southern land of the terrific devastation of treason. The Messrs. Anthony have arranged a series of views representing scenes of immortal interest in this connection. The pictures are adapted for the stereoscope, and are of exquisite clearness and beauty. The collection is already large, and will be complete in a short time. There is no more vivid light to be imagined for the page of history than a stereoscopic collection of this sort. We should think every man who could afford the trifling price would determine to possess a case fitted with these fresh and brilliant miniatures of the war.

We all want a memorial of the country's latest martyr—Abraham Lincoln. The different photographs are of the highest interest, but any one of them is but a partial record, and leaves untold a great many aspects of that rugged and kindly face. A statuette which we noticed at Schaus, by the celebrated sculptor, J. A. Bailly, has been eminently successful in blending the different characteristics in one consistent result, and presenting the effigy of the President in the dignity of simplicity and charm of truth. It is a full-length figure, cast in a natural standing attitude, and full of the kindness, the honor, the domestic divinity of the man. It is such an image as no nation would blush to recognize for its father.

Among the most sparkling and original periodicals of the day, we place the Phrenological Journal, issued by Fowler and Wells. It differs from other magazines of its price and class in having ideas of its own. There is always something fresh to light upon. The student of character can have no better guide to assist him in his investigations. It is charmingly personal, having a series of the most piquant biographies of people conspicuous in society or the public world, and in its original illustrations and excellent typographic style, it offers a constant invitation to the eye.

The theatrical matters of the city are languishing a little with the enervation of the season, but there is still a decent circle of attractions.

The classical style, noble figure, and expressive face of Miss Hosmer have been lent this week, to a new series of representations at the Winter Garden. She has appeared in the dramas of "Evadne and Fazio," and has not disappointed the high expectations raised by her original translation of the "Traviata." She has a sweet voice, enthusiasm, and the charming faults of youth.

Maggie Mitchell has made a success of the romantic drama, entitled "The Pearl of Savoy." It is a mélange of acting, singing and dancing. The romantic fancy, adapted from Linda, of depicting the lunatic Savoyard, tempted home all the way from Paris by a familiar air from Pierro's organ, is hardly probable enough for the stage, but Miss Mitchell renders it with considerable pathos and effect.

Barnum's beautiful capture, Miss Emilie Melville, crowds his lecture room from night to night with faces eagerly bent on her graceful representation of "Dot." She is really a beautiful creature, and will not long remain outside of the brighter triumphs of the regular stage.

We notice that Wm. Knabe & Co., have donated a splendid Knabe piano to the Chicago fair. A finer instrument never saw the light, and the visitors to the exposition were fairly astounded at the volume of melody which rolled from it through the vast building. Looking at this magnificent donation as a specimen of their work, we cease to wonder at the universal appreciation met with, or the fact that though constantly increasing their facilities, the Messrs. Knabe are unable to keep pace with the demand for their pianos.

A Good Opportunity for a Profitable Investment.

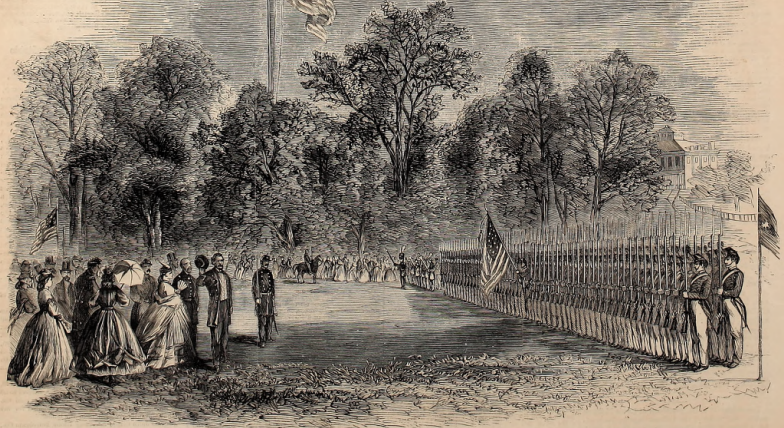
THE GLOBE PETROLEUM CO.

This is a company made up of gentlemen, who have combined for the purpose of working a large and fine Petroleum property, consisting of 200 acres of land in f e, and 405 acres in 20 year leases, situated in the best oil districts of Ohio and Western Virginia, and in close proximity to river navigation and railways. A principal part of the property is in Washington county, Ohio, but a few miles from Marietta. Within a few days a sixty-barrel well has been struck, only a few rods from the lower boundary of the property of the Company, on Newell's Run. There are also fine wells above the property, and it is regarded as certain that the wells now going down on this property, which is only a small part of the aggregate held by the company, will yield a splendid return. The lands and leases are all paid for, and clear of every incumbrance. The members of the company only desire to dispose of their reserved shares for the purpose of sinking more wells on their lands and leases. They desire to put down at least twenty wells this summer. The success of a single one would be all the shareholders could wish for in the way of return on their investments. The oil in the part of Ohio where the Globe Company's property is situated, is found at much less depth than in Pennsylvania, and is generally of a denser quality and of double or treble value. There is room on the company's lands for hundreds of wells, with no risk of interference one with another.

The best guarantee of the bona fide character of the Globe Company is the known energetic character and unquestioned position of its founders. Mr. Frank Leslie is President, and Hon. E. G. Squier, late U. S. Minister in Central America and Commissioner in Peru, is Vice-President. The other directors are eminent business men, and the General Superintendent, Mr. Murray, one of the most experienced Petroleum men in the United States.

Thirty-five thousand shares, out of the total $100,000, are offered to the public at $2 per share, subject to no further call or assessment, as the property is paid for. The money, as already said, is only wanted for the further and full development of the lands.

Address John Clapp, Secretary Globe Petroleum Co., 458 Broadway, New York.



SEVENTEENTH ANNUAL REGATTA OF THE NEW YORK YACHT CLUB, JUNE 8.—ROUNDING THE BUOY OF THE S. W. SPIT, GOING DOWN.—SKETCHED F. H. SCHELL.

BELLE ISLAND, JAMES RIVER,
One of the Prisons of Union Soldiers.

In a recent number of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, we gave a sketch of the camp on Belle Island where our brave lads were imprisoned. This view was taken on the island itself. We now present a view of it taken from the banks of the James river, and certainly a pleasanter spot can hardly be pictured. As we have before described, Belle Island is about half a mile long, and is situated nearly in the middle of the stream. It will now, doubtless, return to its ancient occupation, as a pleasant place for pic-nics and courting—hence its name; but it will indeed be a very dull and unimpassioned nature that does not think, as he treads in future years this beautiful spot, of the thousands who have been slowly put to death by that miserable sullen tyrant who now awaits trial in his cell in Fortress Monroe.

RUINS OF THE CONFEDERATE ARSENAL, RICHMOND, VA.

As an interesting reminiscence of the mightiest struggle that ever took place in the world, and as a proof how malignant in its dying throes the slave rebellion was, we give a sketch of the ruins of the Confederate Arsenal, which was fired by the rebels when they evacuated Richmond. Our sketch represents it as it appeared on the 13th of April, nearly a fortnight after the last of the rebel army had marched out, only to find their last ditch to surrender, not to die in. Many thousand small arms were destroyed, the remains of which are shown in our picture.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GRANT REVIEWING THE CADETS AT WEST POINT, JUNE 8.

THE LOVE LETTER.

BY JENNIE E. GRIFFITH.

SHE wanted—she felt her pen poising over
The satin sheet's creamy glow—
Newly invented words, to express to her lover
Something he longed to know.

Something to melt from the snow of its pages
Limpid as water and clear,
Sweet as bird song is, when nature presages
The robins for May to hear.

Chaste as the missals wild flowers illumine,
In the cloisters of early spring,
Saintly hovered vestals, with eyes half human,
Whose each look is worshiping.

The pink of her cheek, as she sat and pondered,
White lids veiling her eyes—
Over her forehead and temples wandered,
In happy heart ecstacies.

Oh! timid soul, regal in womanly ermine,
Love hut for love should he,
Can you not on some gracious speech determine
For the liege who gave royally.

I read, as she wrote in her smiles and blushes,
That bright-winged as humming-birds,
Her thoughts sipped at fountains where nectar gushes
In the honey of tender words.

The Modern Cinderella.

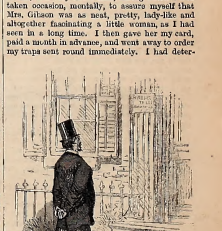
BY LIZZIE CAMPBELL.

I STOOD in the bright May sunshine, in the yet early morning, and looking over the cow fence, into the narrow backyard, watched her at her work—a pretty a little maiden as you could find in all the great city of New York. Her torn dress showed her little bare ancles, and the tiny little feet thrust into great boots—"too wide, a peek!" the sunbeams played hide-and-seek among the waves and tangled curls of her uncovered hair, and losing themselves in its yellow glitter, forgot to come out any more; and her slender little fingers picked the cinders from the ash heap and flung them into the pan beside her with all the skill of an adept in the employment. I looked and speculated about the pretty little cinder-picker till my eyes grew moist, and a tear rolling down my cheek awoke me from my reverie. Then I remembered that I was that morning engaged in the cheerful occupation of looking up a boarding-house for myself, and in order to be successful in the pursuit I must move on. I did so; I wandered down the whole length of the street, and into another one, stopping now and then to question at the doors from whence stared the information: "A room to let for a single gentleman." "Boarding for single gentlemen only. "Rooms to let, to gentlemen." "Front room and board for one gentleman" and other such intimations, all invariable to gentlemen only. "What a fortunate sex I belong to," I thought, "and what in the world, I wonder, becomes of all the poor, nemarried ladies—or married either, for that matter? What can be the reason that no one advertises for lady-boarders? O, now I have it—boarding-houses are always superintended by women. That must be the secret of the apparent disinclination on the part of housekeepers in general to offer shelter to the female heart."

Thus ruminating I had traversed half-a-dozen streets, so far unsuccessful in my search.

Presently I found myself in front of an old-fashioned, but very neat and cosy brick cottage. On the left-hand side, and just beneath the bell-knob, was the following information, inscribed on very white, clean paper, in a free, bold hand-writing:

"A small front parlor, with bedroom adjoining, to let. Meals sent up if required."



No preference was expressed for either sex; and I hesitated for a moment before pulling the bell-knob—perchance a gentleman boarder might not be acceptable.

"The place will suit me, I know," was my remark, made in an undertone to myself; "and—here goes!" I rang the bell with unnecessary violence. Presently it was answered by a tidy maid-servant, and I was ushered into the coziest of parlors and informed that "missus would be down in a minute." The minute passed, and was multiplied by the figure 5, and then "missus" entered.

"DRESS SHOWED HER LITTLE BARE ANCLES,"

We agreed about terms, and I engaged the room, in a very short time, during which I had taken occasion, mentally, to assure myself that Mrs. Gibson was as neat, pretty, lady-like and altogether fascinating a little woman, as I had seen in a long time. I then gave her my card, paid a month in advance, and went away to order my trups sent round immediately. I had determined at first to have my meals sent up to my room; but on consideration I changed my mind, and at six o'clock that evening I dined at the family table. There were but four other boarders besides myself, and though, as I subsequently learned, all had had the same option with regard to meals that had been offered to myself, none had availed themselves of it, and all four dined with us. A gentleman and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. O'Brien, and two other gentlemen, named, respectively, Grimsby and Nailly, myself and our landlady made up the dinner party. And a very cosy little party we made; the gentlemen were social and friendly, and the ladies were both pretty and witty. Before the end of the week we were all like one family, and I declared a dozen times a day that never in my life had I been so comfortable.

IN SEARCH OF A HOME.

"I never see Mr. Gibson, Molly," I said to the tidy maid-servant one day, "is your mistress' husband never at home?"

"Husband, sir? O lor' bless you missus is a widdy, sir, and has been, goin' on to four year now."

"Whew!" was the elegant and very long drawn whistling exclamation with which I greeted this intelligence; and if the truth must be told I just slipped a dollar into Molly's hand, and told her she was a "jolly girl."

"Yes, sir, thank you—anything else, sir?"

"Not just now, Molly—by the way, did you say you've lived with Mrs. Gibson all those four years?"

"Five year, sir; I was here when poor Mr Gibson died, and didn't misuse tabs on awful, though! Why, sir, I never see a woman go on like she did—it was cry and sob and walk the floor all day, and sob and cry and walk the floor all night, with her, for weeks and months. I do sometimes think it wonderful how she got over it at all, and I think I be dreaming to see her so chipp'y and pretty now-a-days."

"Yes, a charmed little soul!" I thought, with a throb of admiration and pity and love for the fair widow.

"Well, Molly, one can't go on mourning for ever, you know; and if your mistress had continued to do so she would have been with her husband before this, and you wouldn't have such a nice place, nor I such a jolly little parlor."

"That be just true, Mr. Timford—for I how I am washing my linen—yes, sir," said Molly caught up her dust-brush and hurried away to answer Mrs. Gibson's call, leaving me to my reflections.

Now I observed Mrs. Gibson—pretty little Widow Gibson as I pleased myself by calling her now—I admired her greatly; so, too, did Ormsby and Nailly—that I had seen from the first, and had smiled to see the sheer way wh ich she, well aware of the admiration of both had managed to keep neither; and yet remained on the most friendly relations with both. Then I thought it was a combination of shrewdness and policy, on the part of a pretty married woman, who was not disposed to quarrel with a man for simply admiring her; but now I was not quite decided in my opinion for being a widow she was entitled to the love and admiration of any man disposed to bestow it on her. Was it a coquette, or did she like me better than either of them? I had once or twice been tempted to think so, but a wonderful sense of becoming vain had always stepped between me and the flattering fancy. I thought a long time, unconsciously, now I really did not intend to waste my time so unprofitably. At last I decided to be guided by future indications of her preference, and so to take off my mind from a weight of worrisome conjecture.

Mrs. Gibson decidedly favored my existence; clearly my attentions were agreeable to her. I was more than pleased at the progress I made, and I heartily pitied my less fortunate rivals, Ormsby and Nailly.

The last charm was added to the lovely widow, and this was it: I was wold-do in the matter of goods, in fact, I was richer than either of my rivals, and the disagreeable suspicion had sometimes darted across my mind that I was loved only because of this advantage over the others. It was about this time that a rich uncle died, and left me hair to a large fortune. The uncle was the former wealth four times, and instead of showing greater pleasure in my society, or in any way encouraging my suit, Mrs. Gibson manoeuvred that we was characterized by a sort of pensive regret, that I felt sure I interpreted aright. She was evidently sorry that I was not a richer lover before, as fearing that increase of worldly goods might put a barrier between us. This was indeed flattering to me, but, I felt like deceiving her and myself alone, and I encouraged the belief. My mind was made up. I resolved to lay my hand and fortune at my mistress's feet.

This resolve was taken one morning while I sat waiting for my shaving water to be brought me, just as I had arranged in what words to make my proposal, the maid tripped lightly in.

"Please, sir, Mr. Nailly," I said, without turning towards her.

"Yes, sir," said a voice, but not Molly's—a voice so fresh and sweet that I turned and saw—the pretty little cinder-wench of weeks before, and whom I recognised immediately.

"Hilla, Cinderella! Why, my dear, where in the world do you come from?"

"From the kitchen, sir. Molly was very busy, and she told me to bring up the holding water."

"But how do you come to be in the kitchen, pray?"

"In the kitchen, sir? Why, I am always there?"

"Do you live here?"

"Yes, sir."

"Bless me! How long have you lived here?"

"Ever since I can remember, sir."

"Indeed! And what shall do you do?"

"Why, I wash dishes, and sweep sometimes, and pick the cinders—anything they tell me to do."

"You do, eh? Excuse my astonishment, but you're amazed me. And now you're going to wash dishes and sweep, and do anything you're told, instead of being the princess you were a month ago?"

She turned pale and the room with a quick, light, firm step, and it's a wonder I did not shave my chin off as well as my beard, while I stood watching the graceful motion of her form in the glass and thinking of little Cinderella. She was dressed much the same and looked much the same as on her arrival. I had first seen her, but colder than I had then thought her. As she stood before me and talked with me she must have been about fifteen—so it was in Mrs. Gibson's backyard I had first seen her, picking cinders, doubtless some poor wood-horse wild that my kind-hearted Julia—I learned her name by that time—had picked up, and was trying to rear in honesty and industry. Dear little widow! I smiled at the thoughts given up to my fair Julia and her little protégée, that I was far down the street ere I remembered the commission prepared I was to have made that morning. To go back was bad luck; and so that opportunity passed by. Several more days passed away, and uncertainty was still my portion; I could find no fitting opportunity to declare my passion to Julia.

I had seen Cinderella—that is, Jessie, for that was her name—once or twice since the morning on which her unexpected appearance so surprised me, and I had spoken once to Mrs. Gibson about her. Julia was not pleased with the subject of conversation I had chosen.

"Has that lazy, slovenly child been bothering you, Mr. Timford?" she exclaimed.

"Not bothering me, dear Mrs. Gibson—not bothering me at all, I assure you. She merely brought some hot water to my room the other day."

"I told her never to enter any of the rooms, Mr. Timford. I would not have any one annoyed by her shatterly appearance for the world; and it was very stupid of Molly to let her go to your room. I will forbid it more strictly than before."

"Pray don't do that; it doesn't annoy me to have her about me at all, dear Mrs. Gibson—I like the child."

"I have noticed your kindness in saying that, George" (once or twice she had called me George before, but on this occasion my heart did not palpitate at the familiarity), "and I am sorry that I am worried by her, and you wish to put your own feelings out of the question. That child is the innocent cause of my life; for years I have been trying to make something of her, but her indolence and untidy habits baffle my efforts."

"Is it possible? And yet she looks a very sweet and gentle little girl."

"That is the most provoking part of it. I was taken in by her sweet looks when I first took charge of her; and she deceives every one in the same way. She never dared to be lazy and untidy in the rigor she deserves, and which might, perhaps, cubdue her properly, lest I might seem harsh towards her. Oh, my life is worn out with her," and a few sudden tears of vexation sprang to Julia's bright eyes, making them brighter than before. I was overjoyed to see my fair lady so moved, and have been decided in the next minute, but for the inopportune entrances of Nailly. I believe the good-natured fellow thought himself sent and was glad of it, for a smile lingered about his lips.

A few days later I had left the house earlier than usual, and was walking down the street when I forgotten my gloves. I ran back, letting myself in with my latch-key, and was coming through the hall when I heard a sound of sobbing, a smothered sob caught my ear, and I stood and listened. The sound came from the dining-room on the left, and was presently succeeded by tender indications of grief. It was my love—some sorrow had befallen her, and I must comfort her with Cinderella as I generally called her—her head bent upon her arms, crying and sobbing as though her heart would break. I crept out over her stood Mrs. Gibson. Julia, my Julia, as I had often fondly called her when alone—white with rage, trembling, and her eyes blazing with passion.

My head whirled, and a positive thrill of horror, succeeded by loathing and disgust, swept over me. Oh, you would wait on Mr. Timford, little toad, would you? Have I not told you again and again never to enter the rooms? Answer me, little viper! Speak!"

"Yes—mother," sobbed the child, and I had not heard that my ears deceived me, that I was the fool of fancy or a dream, when I heard the word. Two years passed by, and I had never heard sir Julia Gibson did at that name. She caught the poor trembling child by the arm and forced her to look at her, with a malicious jerk, and then, shaking her violently, she said:

"How many times have I forbade you to call me by that name? If you value your life, never call me mother again."

"My father bade me call you so, and I sometimes forget."

"Forget again at peril of your life. Your father, indeed? Your father is in his grave, poor fool, and you will be there soon."

"And so do I—so do I," and the poor child sank down again, and wept afresh.

Mrs. Gibson gave a short, heartless, insulting laugh, and turned suddenly. I had but just time to slip around the hall and into the parlor myself ere before she came out, and passing the room in which I was, I hear her run upstairs to her own apartment. In the next moment I was in the dining-room, and had raised Jessie from the floor. She looked at me with a shudder, and pushed me away with one hand, and covered her face of terror.

"Don't be afraid, my child, I have witnessed the scene between you and that bad, cruel woman. Jessie—you are Jessie, are you not?—and I will make it my care that never again shall any harsh hand be raised against you while I live. That woman is not your mother!"

"Oh no, no, sir, she is not."

"Then her husband that was, Mr. Gibson, was your father?"

"Yes, sir."

"And she always treated you cruelly?"

"Ever since papa's death—before that, from the time that papa married her, I was a slave."

"Where is your mother, Jessie?"

"Fifteen, next January."

"Who took you away from her?"

"Mrs. Gibson."

"When?"

"Immediately after my father died. Death" (she shuddered) "was brought you home here, immediately?"

"Yes, sir, she put me to board in a farm-house, for a whole year, with very poor people and she told me if I ever told any one my name she would punish me dreadfully. But, oh, sir I don't stay here—don't speak to me any more, please, or what will become of me?"

"You cannot stay—you are not happy here? You would not be content to go away from here to school where you would be well-cared for, well-treated, and free from your cruel step-mother's tyranny."

"Oh, sir, if I might—it would be like going to heaven."

"My child, you shall. You are not afraid of me? Look at me—I have no little sister—you shall be my sister. Meet me at the corner of this street to-night at eight o'clock; I have a kind, good friend, a lady, who will be as a mother to you, and with her advice and assistance a suitable school shall be collected for you. Say good-bye to me, and dry your tears, for you shall never know them any more. Good-bye. Remember eight o'clock."

Hurriedly and mistakenly I left the house; and it was not till I had walked far down the street that I took time for calm reflection on what I had done. I was not sorry—no, but I did not regret it; and if I had it would have been useless, for I would not have gone back in what I had considered my life; for I knew that I should have disappointed the relinat hope I had seen flash into poor little Jessie's eyes when she realised that her freedom wrested her that night.

I proceeded directly to Mrs. Ashburton's, and briefly related to her what I have told my readers. She half shook her head, and smiled; and then, as I knew she would, finally consented to become the protectress of my adopted sister till I could find a suitable school to place her in.

That evening I did not return to dinner at my boarding-house, as had been my invariable custom to do up to that time; resolved to give no ground for suspicion on the part of my landlady I dined at the "Cosmopolitan," and proceeded to my room at eight o'clock. The child was waiting for me, pale, trembling, but resolute; and I at once made her understand the duty of my friend.

I kept a close watch on Mrs. Gibson for the first few days immediately following Jessie's disappearance. The signs of her anxiety, uneasiness, and whiever her state of mind might be concerning the child, I was glad to think I might not have observed them at all, had I not known that there were reasons for her feeling at least uneasy. She was not long in, and I satisfied myself that whatever uneasiness she might feel was solely on her own account, and more than counterbalanced in mine by the same cause of it.

"Heartless, unfeeling, brazen—oh! I was fast growing to despise and hate my lovely, fascinating widow!

The weeks flew on. Not once had Mrs. Gibson alluded to Jessie's disappearance, and I seemed to have utterly ignored the fact of her ever having existed.

In the meantime my pretty little protégée was snugly disposed of in a flourishing seminary in Troy, since become rather famous as a place of learning, this seminary rapidly; I received every fortnight the most satisfactory news concerning her from the head of the establishment, and every week a little letter from Jessie herself. I had not changed my boarding-house, for I felt convinced that there was more in the little Cinderella than I had discovered with my life's love appeared on the surface; so I lost no opportunity of studying Mrs. Gibson. Incessibly I had failed to find the slightest clue wherewith to unravel the mystery of her character, and I was beginning to despair of ever finding out what she is beloved; and I was not hated by her. Mrs. Gibson grew more pensive and made strenuous efforts to win back my allegiance.

Ormsby had completely resigned the position I had taken so much pains to obtain; and Nailly and Ormsby were left to contest the field alone.

A year passed away, and Troy once, to see my little protégée; and found a lovely young girl, in elegant summer attire, with golden hair clustering in curls all down her back, and told with a bow of pale blue ribbon, and whose eloquent blue eyes thanked me so sweetly, so tenderly, for what I had done for her, that I was not conscious that I bent forward and taking her in my arms kissed the fresh, rosy lips. Then Miss Jessie Gibson blushed rosy as the morning, and extricated herself from my arms with a pretty embarrassment that reminded me of her former lady. On my way back to New York the next day I thought much more of the fair Cinderella than in my warmest friends I had on the subject of her step-mother. Months passed on, and nothing happened—that is, nothing of moment, and I was impatiently waiting for something to happen—for that there was something, and that of considerable importance, to happen soon I felt such a presentiment was almost amounted to certainty. I had lunched at a certain restaurant down town, where I was known, and where I had a table set apart for me that up to my meal removed from general observation. I was taking my lunch there one day, when I heard my name spoken in a voice by where I sat, and the sound of it awoke my attention.

"I tell you," said the voice, "she is doing her utmost to entrap this rich young sprig, Timford; and I hear that he was or is rather sweet on her boy-baby or word for it. Russel, the pretty little widow, will throw you over for the rich swell, and so you lose your Julia."

"She dare not; I have her in my power," was the confident reply.

"Wasn't there a child of Gibson's, at the time of his death?"

"Yes, a girl; but she is dead."

"Dead! Is there any proof to the proofs of that?"

"No; but Julia has told me that she died of scarlet fever at a farm-house somewhere—a place she sent her to board, I believe, after taking her from school."

"It is my opinion your sweet Julia is a perfect devil of a woman; but yet I don't think her bold enough to have put the child out of the way."

"If quiet, Hendrix, for heaven's sake! What should non-sense you talk; yet I wouldn't wish strangers to hear even such idiotic remarks about the lady soon to be Mrs. Russel."

"Be advised by a friend, then, and look sharply after the future Mrs. Russel before she becomes Mrs. Timford."

With this remark they rose from their table and left the restaurant together, having thrown me into a far from pleasurable state of mind. I was now convinced of what I had already suspected; there was between Mrs. Gibson and Mr. Russel, who was, no doubt, her legal adviser, a conspiracy to rob the child, Jessie Gibson, of her inheritance, and as a reward for his share in the transaction, the lawyer had been promised the hand of the step-mother. Did he believe the girl dead? I asked myself; and if he did, was I able to prove that she was not so; I thought of the farm-house with the name of which Jessie and which she had remembered well enough to tell me the name of the people, and to give me a tolerably clear description of where the place was situated.

I resolved to look it up at once. That evening I dressed to go home. Mr. Russel was there, and I saw Mrs. Gibson leave the table. Dinner was just over. With the least perceptible degree of agitation I approached the mistress of herself, as she, I detected the signs. What would I not have given to have heard the conversation that passed between them in that little back parlor—but it was impossible. Much as they deserved it, and greatly as I desired to be of service to Jessie, I could not play the part of spy or eavesdropper. One thing was clear, however, I must act quickly, if I would act at all; for it was evident that matters were reaching a crisis between the widow and the lawyer. No longer sure of me, she would conclude the bargain with the lawyer. She would be his wife; and his reasons for justifying himself in whatever course he had pursued, or intended to pursue, he will succeed in a high strung.

Strategy! I said, to myself. Yes, I answered. It is the only card left me, and I must stake all upon the issue of that card.

Instead of coming out in search of the farmhouse, I went a cruder agent, in search of my attentions to the widow. This time with a degree of warmth that was unmistakable, and successfully returned my lover. She left me that night more than she had ever done before. Lawyer Russel called frequently; but his insincerity, instead of becoming more marked as time went by, on the part, rapidly became from coldly polite to freezingly distant, and to my infinite joy I perceived that her manner to me constantly became cordial. This was the event towards the accomplishment of which I now bent all my arts and energies. My fortune I felt sure would turn against her, and in revenge reveal the entire plot to me.

How kindly fate was the matter in hand at this juncture, and managed yet more skilfully, and in this manner:

The lady whom I had sent to the farm-house, and who was also my very dear friend, had returned triumphantly. Matters of that nature are and in her self-reliance, speaking from experience, they are generally quite easy, especially so when one has the law and a tolerably long purse on one's side.

At the farm-house my friend Barlow was informed that a little girl, Jessie Gibson, had been laid low with scarlet fever, had died of scarlet fever, and had been buried from their house; but with the aid of threats and money the conscientious Mr. Bunnister, stated at last that the country people had no further evidence about the child. Jessie Gibson had been sold by the lady who had given her in charge to them, that she had died suddenly of scarlet fever after they had received the money before. Of course was no proof that Jessie was dead, while I possessed strong proofs that she was living. My friend had a quiet chat with the landlord after dinner, and went to my room to discuss the subject that now engrossed my thoughts to the exclusion of all others. We were interrupted by Mrs. Gibson to have gone out, I think, by a curious coincidence, every one else was out. Sir and Mrs. O'Brien had gone to the opera, and the two girls, deluded by me, had gone out arm in arm, drawn together, probably, through mutual sympathy. I had a reason in remaining in my room, and a reason for making it supposed that I had gone out. I had heard Molly call her mistress down a low tone, that Mr. Russel was waiting to see her in the back parlor. Mrs. Gibson would probably have thought me horribly impolite that I did not hasten to pay my respects after hearing that name. I was rewarded. The conference in the back parlor had lasted about half an hour when the silence was broken by the violent opening of the door, and the voice of Mr. Russell, as he came into the hall:

"I tell you I understand you at last, madam," he said furiously. "But it is not yet too late. You may have thought me fool enough to believe in your girl's death—it was my policy to make you think so. But she lives, and I will find her."

"You may find her if you can, sir, but she is in my possession."

"I have seriously thought of telling her that myself," was the calm reply.

At this I made a gesture to Barlow, and on tiptoe he approached my door.

"You are welcome, if you really willing," resumed the lawyer, "to have her informed that you forgot sworn oath and bargained to bring all your child's property to yourself, and that I was to prove it the genuine last will and testament of her father?"

"You may even do that. I don't think that her severe opinion—when you have found her—will give me much trouble. As to the property, I can afford to lose it."

"Indeed! You can afford to lose the love, too, of that infatuated fool whose money you hope to get instead of it? I shall tell Mr. Timford also, all that you are so willing I should tell Miss Gibson."

"He would not believe you."

Again I had acted on impulse, and it served me well. By this time Barlow and myself were but a yard from the belligerents. I stepped forward and confronted my landlady.

"Pardon me, Mrs. Gibson," I said, "that I believe every word of what this gentleman has threatened you with."

She looked at me wildly; an expression of the deepest rage passed over her face, and then she gave a sudden, sharp scream, and fainted. She unfortunately could not to the last, I must admit. I did not show so much consideration as I might once have done to my insensible landlady. I merely rang the bell and gave her over to the care of Molly, who was so utterly amazed as to be almost good for nothing.

With the lawyer we made quick work. Denial was useless in the presence of a witness who could ready to vouch for all he had heard; and so Mr. Bussel came to terms very easily.

I will not linger over this part of my little Cinderella's fortunes, for though it was in its way a triumph, it does not give me that satisfaction to look back upon that triumphs usually do. For the sake of the heartless scheme—who vainly deserved state prison I thought—I was at last persuaded to let the affair quietly drop, on consideration that my protégée should, without trouble, and immediately, recover all her rights.

The fascinating widow broke up her charming little establishment very suddenly, and all but two of her boarders were lost in expressing their regret. Those two were myself and Mr. Ormsby. Unhappy Ormsby! He was richer than Nailly, and in the desperation of her changed fortunes, Mrs. Gibson consented to accept his hand in lieu of my own. When I see Nailly disconsolate, down-cast and looking daggers at his successful rival, I am sometimes half tempted to offer him a word of consolation. Perhaps I shall some time.

When I next visited Foy, it was to bring Jessie to the house where she had so long been drudge in general and cinder-picker in ordinary to her mighthave-been. Ghosts. And a second time I pressed my lips to that fair brow as I congratulated her on coming into her little fortune. Then some charity urged me to say,

"I don't at all like going away from my old boarding-house, Jessie. Couldn't you be persuaded to turn boarding-house keeper?"

But she shook her head decidedly, and declined stepping into that flourishing business.

"But you won't send me away, Jessie, dear?" I said, with a warm glow at my heart.

And she looked up into my face with a glance half shy, half sunny. The golden opportunity was mine at last. At last I had conquered temptation, had its own way. And when my pretty little Cinderella said "Yes—I love you, dear George!" oh! how I blessed myself that I had not come between me and the utterance of that proposal three years before!

HEARTS AND FACES.

CAN you judge, by a smile, who is gay,
Nor once be misled by the token?
I know that I laughed aloud one day,
From a heart that was almost broken.

But my laughter ran false, do you say?
Or tears followed very soon after,
You are wrong; for I wept not that day,
And my laugh was the merriest laughter.

That my grief was not deep, you maintain,
Since I found it so easy to cover;
But I tell you I writhed with the pain,
And one writhes not when anguish is over.

For my own part, I scarcely believe
That sighing can only mean sadness;
And I would not, myself, you perceive,
That laughter must always prove gladness.

Are you sure it is grief when a tear starts?
Can you trust smiles of truth in all places?
If aught can be falser than human hearts,
It surely must be human faces!

ROSSITOR HOUSE.

BY ETTA. W. PIERCE.

CHAPTER III.—CONTINUED.

I PLAYED on. Somehow the music sounded so strangely to me—so solemn and mournful and deep!—the same undertone running through everything, a spasmodic piece after piece, plunged into gay polkas and gayer waltzes. Oh for that monk's magic fingers! Still the same dirge-like note clung to all.

"Go and rest," whispered a voice behind me.

A circle of dancers were whirling by. I waited until their dance was over. Then, the heat and perfume of the room began to tell upon me in a sensation of faintness. I left my seat, and gliding through the masked and glittering figures, found refuge in a room adjoining, through whose half-open door I could still watch the masters, still sit in the dazzle and laughter and sweet sounds of the magicians.

Good heaven! what a night it was outside! The wind groaned drearily in the shutters; the heavy blinding rain beat against panes of the long, wild roar of the lashed and aroused sea, rose up misinterruptedly. Restless, uneasy, I knew not why, and half-shuddering at every sound of the storm, I paced back and forth across the floor, listening. A shutter had blown loose—I paused at the window, only to be driven back the next moment by a blue, blinding flash of light that cast its lurid glare through all the room. I sank against the wall, wondering and half-stunned.

"Wondering, because just below the casement that pale flash had shown me a saddled horse standing in the rain, pawing the earth fiercely, his bridle held by a groom. Who could be going abroad on such a night from Rossitor House? A sound from the drawing-room aroused me—little ripples of laughter, exclamations of triumph or surprise, mingling voices—they were unmasking. Then followed a quick, portentious hush, and a clatter of feet in the hall. I looked up, and halfway down the stair-case saw the figure of the monk, his mask in his hand, his black robe slipping down behind him, and his face—the face of Judge Rossitor—set, white, terrible, advancing towards me like a spectre's.

"Miss Darrow!"

"Sir!"

I rose up. My heart gave a great bound, then stood still.

He came in, closing the door behind him. One hand fallen at his side, crushed something white; like paper.

"I think I can trust you," he said, advancing close to me, and in the other hand grasping my arm like a vise. "You will not faint or shriek? We shall have enough of that when the news is told in the house. A man who was found lying on on Mrs. Rossitor's dressing-table ten minutes ago —read it."

The great drops of agony stood on his forehead, his eyes were like living coals, but he smoothed the crushed paper out with a hand that never trembled, and stood by to see me read. The note ran thus:

"MR HUSBAND—I may call you that for the last time—for ever. For years I have loved Gerald Wyvil; we were plighted long ago. If I was then false to him and to my own heart, this horror is my punishment. I go with him from beneath your roof, never to return. I have never loved you as I ought, never been the wife you have deserved; you know this only too well. I do not ask you to forgive me for wrenching your happine.s, for bringing disgrace on your good name and on our child. But would that I could reach you, I say, Do not seek to follow me. When you read this I shall be far beyond your reach. God bless you. Ask Miss Darrow to pray for me.

ADELE."

Pled—gone together! No, I did not shriek or faint. My eyes went from the letter to those of the other's eyes one moment, each seeing in the other the desolation of a terrible loss; then I turned away, and, with my head throbbing blindly at the black, pitiless wall.

God knows what passed next. To me it was all like the dim, uncertain things seen darkly in a dream. The galloping away of that half-demented man in the storm; then, through the din of the wild storm, the quick scattering of the gay masters, in the breath of evil tidings, as chaff is scattered by the whirlwind; the gathering of the family servants peering in at the doors, the dreadful silence and darkness that settled down in the long halls and chambers of Rossitor House, all quiet—all—but where the feet of the revelers had been, and the child that awakened in the lonely nursery and cried herself to sleep again for the echo would come no more.

From upon the floor, with my face in the dust, I lay till the first grey gleam of morning; then, drenched, haggard and ghastly, Judge Rossitor came back. This much, and this only, he had learned regarding the fugitives: they had hired a boat for Rossville Harbor, ten miles farther down the coast, and departed from there at midnight, with two seamen and Mrs. Rossitor's French maid. Beyond that nothing was known; but the daylight, perhaps, might bring further tidings.

A flight across that wild, tossing bay in the darkness! Good Heaven! they were lost!

Gloomy and expectant, in the still dawn, the old house stood waiting. The poplars stretched forth their skeleton arms in warning towards the sea. Then—ah, what then!

Two fishermen, crossing the beach at early daybreak, floated up under the lee of a small, rocky wood, a scarlet rosary, with a cornelian cross hanging from it. The sea had given back the dead.

Her cheek lay pillowed on her hand, they told me—that tender, snow-white hand! About the dead, drowned face dripped and clung the tangled golden hair. The dark eyes were closed, the passionate was at rest. So they brought her back to Rossitor House.

God judges all. It was enough to know that all error, all crime were punished. The past, with whatever it held of light or darkness, had passed into a higher and a holier hand. His judgments are not ours. His mercy is not our mercy.

I asked no question. Perhaps they had shared a common doom—perhaps not. Days escaped. In the dull, dreary apathy succeeding hours of torture, I scarcely cared to know which, for in either case my woe for ever dead to me. The sea had stroke as sharp and sudden as lightning. One moment had sufficed to strip my life of all that was dear, and to leave the husk of love, all trust, all happiness gone like a breath! I looked at my gray-white face in the mirror, and I knew—I knew by its rules. Years had passed over it, not hours.

"There is nothing more," I said.

They had left Rossitor House—never to look upon it more. It was the night after the burial, when that wronged and sorrow-stricken man led to me a little sister, and bade me be a mother to her, with the large tears standing in her solemn eyes.

"I am going abroad, Miss Darrow," he said, quietly, "I may be absent for years—I may never return. There is no one to whom I can confide the care of this child, unless it be yourself. I trust and respect you. I shall feel easier of her welfare if I know you are watching over it. You can remain here, or you can choose a happier home, handed by no associations."

"I will remain here," I answered.

"And you accept the charge?"

I took the little hand of the child, as it came nestling softly into my own, and looked at his pale, stern, sorrowful face.

"My God deal by me as I deal by her."

"I am satisfied," he said, simply, drawing a deep breath.

So he went away; so, also, my new duty began—new, rather than the old continued. He went to Europe, Rossitor House, closed to all visitors, stood up among its poplars, like a great gray phantom, by the stormy, restless sea, and there we lived our quiet, uneventful life with the old family servants, Ada and I. I took no note of time; it was of little and in love marked like ours. The summer birds came and went across the sea. The long, low marshes grew verdant in the spring time, then faded, sere and yellow, again and again. A walk along the sandy shore, some row across the treacherous bay, some gift of fruit or flowers from the kind-hearted people of the long hours of patient thought and study in the still rooms of Rossitor House, made up the sum of weeks, and months, and years. The child at my side was growing taller every day. I had, too, another warning in the streaks of gray beginning to show in the hair about my temples.

Now and then we came from over the sea. He was wandering still, and further away, a hopeless, uneasy spirit, seeking the rest and forgetfulness he could not find. I knew only too well how the quest strong.

"When papa comes back," Ada would say, looking at me with wistful eyes; "do you think he will come, Miss Darrow? Poor papa!" tremulously.

My heart ached for her. No, I did not think he would come.

It was the last day of a long and lovely autumn I was coming up from the shore in a cold, leaden light, with a gray dress on my arm—for I often brought my dresses home to be mended—and a bundle of fancy work in the other hand, for, in the new dreariness of my life, I took a dreadful dislike to idleness, when I suddenly met the rain-dark cloaks. In a clump of evergreens, standing up from the beach, glimmered what was the grave of Agnes Rossitor. There was a broken shaft of purest marble at its head, with the one word, "Agnes," and below, the name of Gerald, and the dead shamefully rustled with a plaintive, solemn sound about the enclosure. The gate was a-swing. I went through, and stood at the head of the grave.

Oh, passionate, ill-fated heart, doomed so early! and low the mocking voice of the surf came booming up in my ears, and I was the grave of Agnes Rossitor. There was a broken shaft of purest marble at its head, with the one word, "Agnes," and below, the name of Gerald, and the dead shamefully rustled with a plaintive, solemn sound about the enclosure. The gate was a-swing. I went through, and stood at the head of the grave.

Oh, passionate, ill-fated heart, doomed so early! and low the mocking voice of the surf came booming up in my ears, and I was the grave of Agnes Rossitor. There was a plaintive, dying cry. Weak and weary with an unspeakable sadness, I leaned against the shaft, and shut and dropped a sprig of holly upon the grave.

"Ruth?" said a voice.

It might have risen up from the grave beneath, it was so low and deep. I started up. A tall, dark shadow stood between me and that streak of living light among the evergreens—the shadow of a man, in a dark cloak, standing there like a statue.

"Ruth!" once more.

Can the sea give up its dead? My brain whirled, I caught blindly at the cold burial stone, as he lifted his cap and stood there before me in the dying light. It was Grant Wyvil!

"Ruth!" he said, "Ruth!"

That low grave at my feet had been made five years before. Slowly from its sere brown outline my dazed eyes rose to his face. Changed, yes, but still the same; worn with many woes, brown, bearded, the hair streaked here and there with silver, the eyes full of a sorrowful remorse.

"Grant!" I answered, as if groping in a dream.

He took one step toward me.

"Don't touch me!" I cried, passionately. "You have not forgotten me? Thank God for this, at least."

Something stirred in my heart faintly, then grew still. I looked at the burial shaft, at the evergreens, at that dark, remorseful face, without speaking.

"I thought you dead," after a long, dreary pause.

"Dead?" bitterly. "I could not die. Death does not come to the few who seek it; and—do you think I could have rested in a grave even, without seeing you once more, without once praying your forgiveness?"

He kept his face turned away from the grave and made a quick, passionate gesture.

"I forgave you long ago, Grant," I answered, hardly recognizing my own quiet voice.

"Ruth!" with fierce eagerness.

"It was the last thing left for either; why should I not?"

A long broken moan; the next moment he was down in the grass at my feet, the brown grass matted and tangled with it, his look in his eyes that I shall never forget. Oh, how dim and far away the twilight and the faint autumn moon seemed—how unspeakably sad and dreary sounded the hoarse, restless sea.

"Ruth, wronged, deserted, yet loved better than woman ever was or will before, have pity! I have sinned, I have also suffered—God alone knows how much—these long, desolate years. See, I am a wreck—I am old. Give me back but the tithe of the old love, but a shadow of the old tenderness, and I will be content. By Ruth!"

The hand he had seized in his fierce, ardent pleading, I drew gently, yes, sorrowfully away.

"Grant, Grant! This grave is between us; it will be between us for ever."

He clenched his hands fiercely together. The white lips were set and cruel.

"But you loved me once, girl?"

"Yes, Grant, once. I pity you now."

"Nothing more?"

"Nothing more."

The clenched hands parted, and fell loosely at his side.

"My God, I have lost all!" he said,

I turned my face away. The tears were thick in my eyes, but they did not fall.

"Not all, Grant. There is truth to live for, and right and duty. For the rest—"

"For the rest?" he echoed, drearily.

"God will take care of it."

His wild, despairing blaze fell on my hands, imprisoned for the last time in his own; the haggard, mournful face, pale to the lips, searched mine for the moment with eager, passionate, wistfulness; then he turned slowly.

"It is our last meeting, Ruth. Farewell."

I heard the crisp rustle of the dry grasses, one last look cast backward after grave, and he opened the little gate and passed through, his head bowed on his bosom, with the slow, faltering step of an old man, and Grant Wyvil and I had met for the last time on earth.

Autumn deepened into the white, cheerless winter. It was when the snow lay drifted on the lonely shore that tires of welcome were lighted on the hearths of Rossitor House, frightening away their gloom and evanescence once more, and a feast was spread, and a fired and lovely wanderer came home.

Dark with the sun of tropic lands, the furrows deeper since he last parched, the sad eyes grave now whose they had once been stern, he entered again into his own halls, like a stranger, and sat down in his old place at his own table.

I held aloof, waiting. Would he find in the tall, graceful girl, who flung her tender, loving arms around him at the threshold, all that he had hoped for, a worthy record of the five long years in which I had watched him? It was a proud face that he wore, I thought, in the white flush of those arms.

He came into the still green room one day, where Ada sat at my feet, with the winter sunshine on her hair, it was a few weeks after his return, and the drooping head rose with pride and shining, and the last of many costly gifts which he had brought her, an Indian necklace of purest coral pearls. Her cheek flushed a little, then she looked up, half shy, half pleading, twisting the spotless coil around her hand.

"Papa, you are a good pupil, but—too partial. Don't give all your treasures to me."

"I will not," he answered, smiling.

But all the while, as I sat at my task, her slender fingers were busy with mine.

"I will, papa—"

"Well?"

"You know."

"Yes," gravely. "You wish I had been kind enough, or grateful enough, to have remembered Miss Darrow. Perhaps I have; who knows?"

The girl's face was glad, earnest then.

He held her back, half playful, half mocking.

"Who was going down to the shore for sea shells, this very morning, little bird? I knew of a horse that stood saddled and bridled half an hour ago, and he does not like to wait. Run away and get your hat."

He stood at the window, his dark, grave, profile turned toward me, gazing out on the desolate shore till the glad echo of the child's eager feet had died away, then he turned suddenly, his face transfigured, his eyes darkening and deep-ning with a new, strange tenderness. The blood leaped from my heart to my brain in one hot, mad bound.

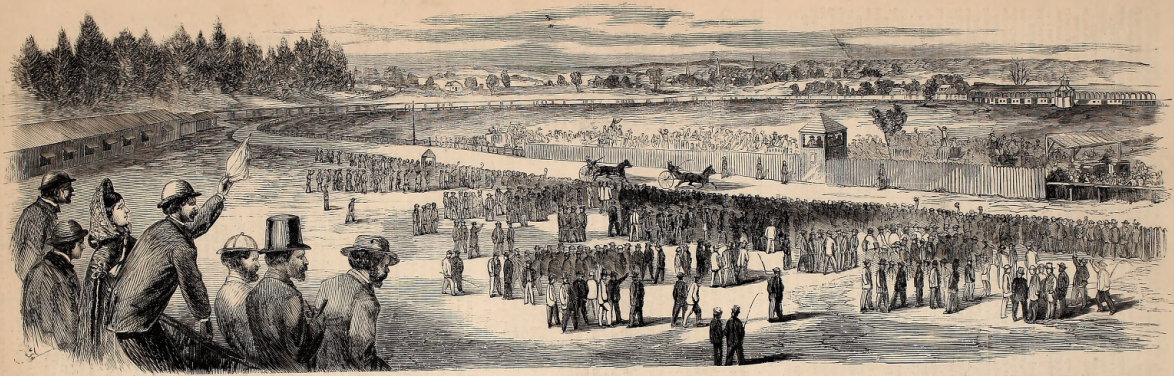
"Ruth," said the grave voice, "I have a gift, hardly worthy of your acceptance, I know, and yet the costliest that I can offer. Will you take it?"

Vaguely wondering, I looked up. What I saw in his face, what deeps unknown, unguessed-of in before, broke on me. Heaven! trust and love have been born of pain and so purified, to dazzle me which has, at last, found faith, and hope, and forgiveness, through your own, and, Ruth, a home—here!"

He opened his arms, with sad, passionate pleading. One quick cry in which my heart answered heart, and I stood in the winter sunlight with my face hidden upon his breast.

Then, over mine, murmured the deep, tender voice, "pain or suffering for either. No good or ill which we may not share together now. Thank God that I could in one moment for the losses of a life!"

Nestling close to his heart, in the happy light, I saw the milk-white seagulls circling slowly over a ridge through the poplars, side by side. Beyond the sea, and inland even, and far off, were ships, stately as dreams. Then, hot, glad, blinding, welled up to my eyes. It was a prophecy, a promise. Heaven knew, I was so utterly at rest, so happy after years, my womanhood crowned and perfected, the pure gold won from all worthless dross, that I could not doubt. I was content, even, that through all the life to come were never, never to fail.



ODD TITLES.—The following selection of titles of novels has been published as the result of a competition among the London booksellers, "for the feeling somewhat:" "Alone in the World;" "Betrought at Last;" "Cousin Kate;" "Dora Darling;" "Dreams of the Churchyard;" and, after trampling down the "Fatal Error," "Married in Haste," "Repented at Leisure," and "Too Late to Mend," arrived at the goal, as it were, advancing "Against Wind and Tide," to "Nobody's Darling," "Sunshine and Storm," and "Wife or Mistress?" This was "A Bad Beginning;" a kind of "Motive to Make Both Ends Meet;" "Harry's Wife;" "Lost Sensation;" and heard "Carry's Confession." "Here he Shattered and Scarred" and "Singing Mollie," "Quick by" "Only poor Nettie," but "Look Before you Leap," for "Who Breaks, Pays," and "Love me True" to the "Old Christian was "Paid in Full," and Carry was "Recommended to Mercy." Then "Dorothy Darling's Secret Down," but Bella perceived "The Woman in White" "Wonderful and Fearful Tales;" "Fatal Secrets;" "Old Chains," and "How to Manage It" she did not know. Then "Sunshine and Storm" and "Wife or Mistress?" and at last she indicated the Crudest Wrong of All," and had "Fifteen Years Ago" "Under a Cloud" "Out of Sight" "Left Behind" "Alone" "Lost to be," and "Hidden Things Aver," for, though "Wife or Mistress?" they are "Strange Bedfellows" and "Never to Be Told."

CUTTING BEETLE.—Blackguard state that the cards of a country-fair, was one of the wise laws of Alfred the Great's proclamation against the Danes. If a man conquered only received a less fallen out of the ranks he had been accustomed to run over hard, ground, for the purpose of recalling the inhabitants of walled cities to their homes before the gates closed. Portland in an English summer lingers until after nine o'clock, and the curfew which "toll'd the knell of parting day" was the very nine o'clock bell, which the Pilgrim Fathers caused to be placed in their new settlement, where household fires were covered over in good season.

THE DEATH OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

BY GEORGE ADAMS.

Sons of freedom bow the head—
Silently and softly tread,
Let no sound of joy arise—
Sorrow dims a nation's eyes.
See, her mighty chief lies low,
See, her leader's life-blood flow,
And within her stately halls,
Dark as night the shadow falls.
Sons of freedom bow the head,
Silently and softly tread.

Chosen by a nation's voice,
Leader of his people's choice,
In his country's darkest hour
See him wield her mighty power,
Mid her best and bravest stand,
Freely giving heart and hand—
Wise in council, brave in deed,
See him for a children bleed.
Chosen by a nation's voice,
Leader of his people's choice.

Not 'mid battle's raging strife
Did her chieftain yield his life,
For with thousands round him lying,
Bleeding, fainting, groaning, dying—
Not while gathering overhead,
Far and near the war-clouds spread;
While a world in wonder gazed,
Awe-struck, breathless and amazed.
Not in battle's raging strife,
Did he there yield his life.

But in midst of victory—
On the day of jubilee,
While triumphal shouts were ringing,
Every voice in gladness singing—
Bright rose as the starlight beaming,
Every face with sunshine gleaming,
Young and old their praise bestowing,
And each heart with joy overflowing.
In the midst of victory,
On the day of jubilee.

Rise! ye brave of every nation—
Rise, and bound with execration,
Foulest deed and basest plan
E'er conceived by man 'gainst man.
Let your voice to the skies
Like Niagara's thunder rise,
Breathing curses loud and long
'Gainst the hands that did the wrong.
Rise, ye brave of every nation,
Brand the deed with execration.

Bright around the mighty dead
See a glorious halo shed;
Hark! a myriad voices rise—
Wafi his name beyond the skies,
Mingling their glad songs of praise
With high Heaven's angelic lays;
'Tis dark Africa sends have cried,
For in Lincoln they lived and died.
Bright around the mighty dead,
See a glorious halo shed.

Now he's entered into rest
With earth's noblest, bravest, best,
Hears the Master's words: "Well done,
Good and faithful servant, come,
Enter thou into my joy.
Dwell in bliss without alloy,
Heaven's great joy shall fill thy soul,
While eternal ages roll.
He has entered into rest
With earth's noblest, bravest, best.

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE IRETON ST JOHN.

CHAPTER XIII.—THE MISTAKE OF YEARS.

On the evening following that on which Guy Raymond paid his short and mysterious visit to the well on Thornton Heath, Claudia and Mrs. Freshfield were sitting together near the fire, in their little cottage, when a loud knock summoned the latter to the door.

Claudia, who looked listlessly at the fire, and noted not the sound, which was loud enough to have roused any one from the deepest reverie.

Mrs. Freshfield opened the door, she saw Guy Raymond standing in the moonlight.

"Are you alone?" he asked.

"Claudia is here."

"No one else?"

"With the exception of Ralph St. Clare, who has fled away, we never have any visitors."

Upon this Guy entered the room, locked the door behind him, and carefully avoiding Claudia's notice, sat down near the door.

Mrs. Freshfield saw at once that something had happened, or was on the eve of happening.

Guy's face was deadly pale. It always was so, more or less; but, upon this occasion, it was of an ashen hue, which denoted intense mental suffering.

"You seem ill, Mr. Raymond," said Mrs. Freshfield, as she took a seat near him.

"I am, indeed," he answered; "but I cannot stay now to think of illness. I am come to take Claudia away."

Mrs. Freshfield started, and grasped the edge of the table convulsively.

"Take her away? take Claudia away?" she repeated.

"Yes; it has become necessary—it must be done! Your brother-in-law has returned, and every moment—this night, perhaps—I expect him at Raymond Park."

Tears started to Mrs. Freshfield's eyes, and she trembled violently.

"I knew it would come to this some day," she murmured sadly; "but I had no conception it would come now."

"As well now as at any time," returned Guy. "You had better at once prepare her for going. I have a carriage at the door."

Mrs. Freshfield smiled painfully as she rose.

"Prepare her, poor child!" she said. "Very little preparation is needed by her. She will understand nothing, except that she is going away from me."

As she spoke, she passed across the room, and neared the spot where Claudia sat.

"Claudia," she said, "you are going out."

The girl understood this at once, and rose up gladly.

It was very seldom that she was permitted to pass beyond the precincts of the cottage, and a chance of a glimpse of heaven, in the free, unshackled atmosphere, was a chance of heaven itself to her.

Mrs. Freshfield speedily attired her in a warm cloak and a pretty little hat, and led her up to Guy Raymond, who took her hand, and, rising, began to conduct her towards the door.

Claudia looked round in vacant surprise.

"Are you not coming mamma?" she said, wistfully.

"No, dear, not now; I will come after you presently. Mr. Raymond will take you home now, where you will find the dark room for you, and such pretty flowers, and he able to do as you like!"

She appealed to the childishness of the beautiful girl of eighteen, whose mind had long since wandered away into the realms of darkness, and the appeal was not thrown away.

Claudia stepped forward, and, kissing her tenderly, said:

"Then you will come soon, dear mamma?"

"Yes, dear, soon."

Guy Raymond, no common courtesy, could bet second the child's invitation, and he did so, accordingly.

"Claudia is right, Mrs. Freshfield," he said. "As soon as matters are a little more clearly settled, you, too, must come to Raymond Park. There is room for you there, as well as for her; but when Freshfield comes to Thornton Heath, it will be as well for you to be here alone. Remember I did not send for her—not one word of Claudia!"

"You need not fear that!" said Mrs. Freshfield. "The ruin is to me more hateful, if possible, than he is to you!"

Guy smiled as he shook her by the hand, and departed.

"That can scarcely be," he said; for that man is more hateful to me than poison—more loath some than even your husband was."

With these strange words he drew Claudia out of the door into the night, and helped her into a carriage.

When he had done so, he bade the coachman drive on, giving him directions how to take; and then, after again saying farewell to Mrs. Freshfield, he entered the carriage himself.

There was now one seat side by side, he drew the girl upon his knee, as he would have done a child, and pressing her closely to him, kissed her fondly again and again, holding her face so that the moonlight fell full upon her features.

Long he held her thus, kissing her rapturously; while Claudia, who understood nothing, returned the caresses willingly.

Then suddenly, something in the look of her beautiful eyes, something in her delicate mouth, seemed to remind him of other days, and pushing her from off his lap on to the seat by his side, he fell back against the cushions of the carriage, and clasped into a reverie.

A reverie, be it said, during which the tears stole from his eyes and trickled treacherously down his unchecked cheek.

Tears! Guy Raymond shed tears!

Yes; blame him not, reader, for when men weep, they weep tears of blood.

Tears are sanctified offerings of love—a relief to the weary and afflicted—a solace where smiles would be mocked at.

The carriage did not take the road to Raymond Park, which, indeed, was but a few miles distant, but skirting the dark palings of the enclosure, passed rapidly away to towards Cumberston, a village six miles further on on the metropolis.

Here, about half a mile from the village, stood Woodbine Cottage, the spot to which Claudia was being rapidly driven.

Woodbine Cottage was a long, low place; in fact, it looked more like a range of buildings than a single house.

A row of dirty brown palings separated it from the road, and the fact of their being four windows on the ground floor gave it all the appearance of an almshouse.

One end, and part of the front of the house was covered with roses, or, rather, creepers, which probably gave it its name of Woodbine Cottage.

The roof was of thatch, and beneath the broad overhanging eaves of which the inhabitants of the nests of a whole tribe of swallows, who, in summer time, made the old house their own, building under the roof, on the gable ends—while some of the more adventurous of them boldly descended the chimney, and attempted to plant a colony in the bedroom fireplaces.

But the pretty, graceful birds were no longer to be seen; they no longer winged their swift flight across the fields, or indulged in amicable chattering on the house-tops.

Behind the house was a long, large garden, which had once been well cultivated, but was now choked with weeds and nettles, which flourished in profusion on the ground which had once been trimly kept, and planted with all kinds of delicious and pleasant-looking vegetables.

The gravel paths had run a long way on the road to ruin—the gooseberry and currant bushes, by which they were bordered, untrimmed by the pruning knife, extended their branches in every direction, in friendly salutation to each other.

At the bottom of the garden was a deep stream, which formed the boundary of the premises.

Though deep and rapid, it was of no very great breadth, and was spanned by a rustic wooden bridge, formed in a very primitive method, by driving a pole in either bank, with another in the middle of the stream. These poles were connected by strong planks, guarded by a hand-rail.

On the other side of the stream was a wild tangled copse of beech, and other forest bushes, among which fir trees, willows and poplars, reared their tall heads, as if in disdain of their dwarfish neighbors, while the river banks were fringed with bulrushes, sedge and osiers.

The wood was the favorite resort of a variety of wild fowl.

The snipe rose from the reeds, and winged his rapid, zig-zag, eccentric flight away to some quieter neighborhood; the wild duck sat closely on her nest in the long grass and osiers; while, on moonlight nights, the hoarse, booming voice of the bittern might have been heard by the inmates of the cottage, even though doors and windows were closed.

Strange stories were told of it; wild, weird, supernatural forms were said to walk the tangled paths of the wood. On dark nights the ruins of the neighborhood scarcely dared venture within it, after the hour of nine—the hour of curfew—at which, the unquiet spirit of a murderer was supposed to wander—for murder had been done in the Woodbine Cottage.

At least, so said tradition, pointing to an old wooden cross, moss-grown and blackened by time, which stood in the centre of the wood.

This antique memorial was supposed to mark the spot of a crime of more than usual horror and cruelty; and in the fond fashion of the ignorant rustic, it was haunted by the spirits of the criminal and his victim, who made their nightly appearance on the scene of their former deeds and death.

The cottage, too, had a curious history, dating from a far-back period.

First built in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, it was endowed by a rich merchant as an almshouse.

But during the civil war, and the republican form of government which followed, the endowment was lost.

Then, the residence of a celebrated mathematician and philosopher, it became the resort of men of genius and learning from every part of the country, and not a few important scientific discoveries were made within those low walls.

It was next inhabited by a physician, and then strange reports were circulated—stories of the queer patients the doctor kept there—moping, chattering idiots and raving madmen.

It was a private lunatic asylum.

But two of the heights were to happening to die, people said not a natural death, and the consequence was that the doctor was obliged to leave.

Then, for years, the cottage found no fresh subject of interest in the old house.

Alighting at the cottage door, Guy Raymond and Claudia left the carriage, and led her in.

The poor girl was not surprised at anything. She took all he did and said as a matter of course.

Her mind was too clouded to comprehend change or novelties of any kind.

So she did not observe his caresses, or his tender attentions, or his kind words; nor did she notice that the cottage she now entered was far different from that which she had been accustomed to, and the furniture of the rooms far more costly and luxurious.

Guy Raymond ordered, it is true, gladly over the pretty chairs and tables, and the delicate glasses, and the vases on the broad mantel-piece, and the bright fire that blazed and flickered in the corners; but after a time she sought out her old companion, the fire, and then relapsed into a heavy arm-chair reverie.

Guy Raymond watched her proceedings with much interest.

When he had seen her sit down quietly, he took a chair near her, and spoke to her.

"Do you like your new home, Claudia?"

She looked at him for a painful inquiring glance, as if striving to comprehend his meaning.

"It was like home" which seemed to give her, for an instant, a gleam of intelligence.

Guy Raymond repeated his question.

"Yes," she answered, in a dreamy tone before.

"You will stop here for some time, my child," he said; "so I hope you will make yourself happy."

"Where is mamma?" she asked, suddenly and vehemently.

In an instant all life seemed to have fled from her face—all expression, it seemed to one as beauty —the room appeared suddenly vacant, and cold, and dismal, in spite of all the gay trappings and ornamentation.

Guy kissed her tenderly, and said:

"Your mother shall be with you soon, my dear one—be assured of that. Meanwhile, you will not be alone here. There is some one in the house who will attend to all your wishes and attention."

As he spoke he rang the bell.

In answer to the summons a young woman made her appearance.

She was about twenty-eight, tall and finely proportioned, though her limbs had a vulgar degree of strength in them, and the neck, which sloped into her full and well-developed breast, was short and thick.

Her hands were large, though well made; her body, in fact, had been evidently matured and developed by hard work.

Her face was pretty, though not in every way pleasing.

Her eyes were large and blue, her nose retroussé, her face oval, and her mouth, though large, well-shaped; but it was this last-mentioned feature which sometimes spoiled the face.

Over she full lips a carnesie smile would wreath itself when least expected, and a hard expression fly into her naturally soft eyes.

This girl was named Julia Farren. She was the daughter of poor parents, and she had come to the housekeeper to the new tenant of Woodbine Cottage.

So much for her at present. We shall hear more of her in the future.

She smiled most graciously to Claudia and Guy Raymond as she entered the room.

"This," said Guy—"this, Julia, is your new mistress. Behave to her in all kindness, for she has need of it."

Julia glanced at the new comer, and then returned her gaze to the fire.

The girl was not her mother, and that being so, she cared not who she was.

Guy Raymond soon after left the house, and returned hastily, leaving back in his carriage with a feeling of pleasure and triumph at his heart.

He felt he was at last left at the cottage—the lone woman, from whom he had taken her only companion.

Mrs. Freshfield had stood for some time gazing after the carriage as it rolled away across the moonlight land, and then, returning to her lonely room, she closed the door, and sat down near the table.

Upon this table her eye caught an object.

It was a letter.

Seizing it eagerly, she tore it open and perused it.

It was from Guy Raymond, and ran as follows:

"My Dear Madam—The girl whom you have loved and educated under the name of Claudia is not your child; therefore, grieve not for her. In all she were your child, the assurance that she will be happy and well treated would ease your mind considerably. GUY RAYMOND."

"Not my child!"

The words were grasped out despairingly; and then, with a low cry of anguish, the poor woman fell back upon her chair, weeping and sobbing in her great sorrow.

BLIND.

They say the sun hath backward rolled
The earth-enshrouding pall of night;
The east hath veiled its face in gold;
And morn hath hid her star in light.

The mist is open curtain-wise,
For entrance of the golden ray;
There is bet warmth upon mine eyes;
Upon all other eyes a day.

They say the woodman seeks his hearth,
About his home inspect insect swarms;
And out of day's dine ebbing bath,
The pale stars slowly lift their forms.

But I abide in changeless night,
Without a beacon in my room;
Who found a joy in feeding light,
In forms' green, in wild-flowers' bloom I
Will my dear heart in darkness stay
Beneath the archway of the tomb?

CHAPTER XXVI.—A CHILLING RECONCILIATION.

THAT unfortunate meeting on the stairs made a very deep impression upon Maude Tredethlyn. She had never before encountered drunkenness; and it was one of those sights which seemed an horror to belong to a region of outer darkness, in which decent people had no place. Her father had often been as sober as an archdeacon before the guests were gentlemen. She had heard, now and then, in the course of her life at the desire of a drunken gentleman dismissed with ignominy from the gardens—a drunken groom degraded from the box of the stables. But French and her husband—that he should be think of speech and unsteady of foot under the influence of strong drink! it was almost too horrible to be beheld. She lay awake in the morning sunlight, thinking of Francis Tredethlyn's misdemeanor.

"And just as I had decided that I was learning to love him!" she thought, regretfully. Would they meet at breakfast? she wondered. And if they did meet, what would Francis say to her? A sickly dread of that meeting took possession of her mind. If he apologized, how was she to respond? She could not be possible for her to forget that?

But the inevitable meeting at the breakfast-table was very easily avoided. Mrs. Tredethlyn had a headache, and took her strong green tea and dry toast in the pretty little bedroom, all lace and draperies and Parian statuettes, the satin-wood cabinets and book-cases, the Persian carpets and pale brocades rugs, the marqueterie pardoises and toy Sèvres cottage bindings, selected by Lucretia Lowther. It was altogether a most little boudoir, eminently adapted for the pursuit of French novels, and the neglect of all the duties of life. Mrs. Tredethlyn breakfasted in her boudoir, so there was no uncomfortable meeting between the husband and wife. Francis left the house before noon, in order to keep an appointment with his friend Mr. Lowther. They were going together to the Doncaster spring meeting, where Bohemianism would be rampant, and was to be away for some days. Poor Francis ramble in the library, while his friend waited for him, and scribbled a hasty note to his wife, full of penitence and self-humiliation. He gave the minutes to Mrs. Tredethlyn's maid at the foot of the stairs, while Harcourt was standing in the carriage-way.

ing out of the hall, arranging the strap of a race-glass across his light overcoat. Mr. Tredethlyn went back to the library in search of a railway rug which he had flung off his arm when he sat down to write the letter, and during his brief absence there was a flutter of silk in the hall, and a little conference between Mr. Lowther and the abigail.

Half an hour afterwards when the two men were walking up and down the platform at the King's Cross station, with cigars in their mouths, Mr. Lowther handed his friend the identical letter which Francis had entrusted to his wife's maid.

"You can post that to its address, if you like, dear boy; but I think I should light my cigar with it. The seal is unbroken, you see; but I fancy I can make a tolerable guess at the contents of the epistle. Dear old Frank, if you want to preserve the merest semblance of manhood, the poorest remnant of independence, never beg your wife's pardon."

Of course Mr. Tredethlyn was very angry. Harcourt Lowther was prepared to encounter a given amount of resistance. The wave may lash and beat itself against the quiet breast of the rock; and the rock secure in its supremacy, has only to stand still until that poor worn-out wave crawls meekly to the stony bosom, a conquered and a placid thing. Mr. Lowther had his work to do, and he took his own time about doing it. The apologetic little epistle was not sent to Mrs. Tredethlyn; and at an uproarious after-dinner assemblage at the "Reindeer," Francis abandoned such frivolous stuff as sparkling Moselles and Burgundies for fierce libations of brandy punch. He made a tremendous book for all manner of events, always under the advice of his friend; indeed, its pages contained many rather heavy engagements with Mr. Lowther himself, who effected extreme simplicity amongst the magnates of the turf, but who was nevertheless eminently respected by those gentlemen, as being of the deep and dangerous class—a dark horse, secretly exercised on lonely commons at weird hours of the early morning, and winning with a rush when he was least expected to do so.

While Francis was seeing life through the medium provided for him by his experienced adviser, Maude enjoyed herself after her own fashion. She had been very happy at Twickenham, but she had never until now been entirely her own mistress, with unlimited credit and unlimited ready money, and all the privileges of a matron. At the Cedars she had been always more or less under the father's direction. She had acted very much as she pleased upon all occasions; but she had made a point of consulting him about the smallest step in her simple life; a round of calls, a day's shopping, a little musical gathering after a dinner-party, the amount of a subscription to a charity—even the color of a dress.

But now the young matron shook off even the gentle fetters which had held the girl, and spread her pinions for a bolder flight. A much wider world had opened itself to the merchant's daughter since her marriage. The story of Mr. Tredethlyn's fortune—always multiplied by the liberal tongue of rumor—was one of the most popular topics amongst the denizens of the new district in which Mr. Tredethlyn's house was situated. None of these West End people knew that Lionel Hillary's position had ever endured a dreadful crisis of uncertainty and terror. The marriage between Maude and Francis was supposed to be one of those sublime unions in which wealth is united to wealth—the alliance of a Miss Rothschild with a Master Lafitte—a grand commercial combination for the consolidation of capital.

So Maude took her place as one of the most important novelties of the current year. She gave great receptions in her three drawing-rooms, whose gorgeous decorations were just a little too much like the velvet and ormolu magnificence of a public room at a gigantic hotel. She organized dinner-parties, and revised and corrected a menu with the savoir faire of a Brillat Savarin in petticoats. Always accustomed to a reckless expenditure, she had no idea of the necessity for some regulation in the expenses of a large household. Left a great deal to herself, and frequently at a loss for occupation, she often spent her husband's money from sheer desire for amusement. After that unlucky encounter on the stairs, she resigned herself entirely to the position of a fashionable wife. Her husband went his way unmolested, and she went hers. She was tolerably happy, for the life was a very pleasant one to live; but oh, what a vain, empty, profitless existence to look back upon!—the success of a dinner, the triumph of an audacious toilette, the only landmarks on a great flat of frivolity. But Mrs. Tredethlyn was not at the age in which people are given to looking back; she was rich, beautiful, accomplished, agreeable, with that dash of recklessness in her gaiety which makes a woman such an acquisition in a drawing-room, and the fumes of the incense which her admirers burned before her were just a little intoxicating. The Twickenham loungers, who had worshiped her mutely and reverently from afar off, found themselves distanced now by bolder adorers, and, conversing amongst themselves upon the staircases and on the outer edges of crowded drawing-rooms in the stuccoed district, shook their heads and pulled their whiskers, gravely opining that Mrs. Tredethlyn was "going the pace."

Maude had been Francis Tredethlyn's wife more than six months, and the London season was at its fullest height, when an accidental meeting with Julia Desmond brought about that young lady's restoration to her old position of confidante and companion to the pampered daughter of her dead father's friend. The two women met in the Pantheon, and it was a terrible shock to Maude to see her old companion dawdling listlessly before a stall of toys, dressed in shabby black silk and a doubtful bonnet, and attended by two ungainly girls in short petticoats and scarlet stockings.

The proud spirit of the Desmonds had been crushed by the iron hand of necessity. In these perpetual duels between pride and poverty, the result seems only a question of time. Poverty must have the best of it, unless, indeed, death steps between the combatants to give poor pride a doubtful victory. Julia Desmond had carried her pride and her anger away from the luxurious idleness of the Cedars, to nurse them in a London lodging. The only money she had in the world was a ten-pound note, left out of a sum which the liberal merchant had given her for the payment of a dressmaker's bill. She had the jewels given her by Francis Tredethlyn—the diamonds which she had thrown at his feet in the little study at the Cedars, on the night of the amateur theatricals—but which the sober reflections of the following morning prompted her to retain amongst her possessions. She had these, and upon these she might have raised a considerable sum of money. But the angry Julia had no desire to raise money. A life of idleness in a London lodging was the very last existence to suit her energetic nature. She inserted an advertisement in the Times upon the very day after her departure from Twickenham, and she went on advertising until she succeeded in getting a situation as governess in a gentleman's family. But, ah! then came the bitterest of all her trials. She fancied that her life, wherever she went, would be more or less like her life at the Cedars. There would be a great deal more work, perhaps; there might be less luxury, less gaiety, but it would be the same kind of life; while on any day the lucky chance might arise, and the beauty of the Desmonds might win her some great prize in the matrimonial lottery.

Alas for Julia's inexperienced notion of a governess' existence! She found herself the drudge of an exacting mistress, with every hour of her dreary life mapped out and allotted for her, with less share in the social pleasures of the house she lived in, than if she had been the kitchen-maid, and with two small tyrants in crinkled hair and holland pinafores, always on the watch to detect her shortcomings, and to twist them into excuses for their own. The dreadful monotony of her life would alone have made it odious; but Julia had "a sorrow's crown of sorrow" perpetually pressing on her tortured brow. She had the recollection of happier things—the pleasant idleness at the Cedars, the position of Francis Tredethlyn's affianced wife. And she had given up this position in one moment of ungovernable rage and jealousy; she had suffered one mad impulse of her proud nature to undo the slow work of months. Miss Desmond had ample leisure for the contemplation of her folly during the long winter evenings which she spent in a third-floor sitting-room at Bayswater, hearing unwilling children grind hopelessly at a German grammar by the light of two guttering tallow candles. She did contemplate her folly, while the guttural verbs and declensions fell with a droning noise on her unlistening ears; but the rage which swelled her bosom was against Maude Hillary, and Maude alone.

She saw Maude's carriage in the park sometimes while she took her allotted walk with the unwilling children, who might have been pleasant children enough, perhaps, if they had not been weighed down by intellectual exercises, compared to which the enforced physical labors of Toulon would have seemed light and agreeable. Julia saw her old companion, and her mind went back to the sunny afternoons on the lawn at Twickenham; and the sight of the pretty face and golden hair, the Skye terriers and neatly appointed equipage, stirred the fire of hatred always burning in her breast, until she could almost have shaken her small fist at the merchant's daughter.

She saw the announcement of Maud's marriage in the Times, and hated her still more. She saw Maude in the park, after her marriage, in a more splendid equipage than the landau from the Cedars, and she hated her even more and more. She set her teeth together and drew back under the shadow of the trees to watch Francis Tredethlyn's wife drive by.

"She has cheated me out of it all," she thought; "it would all have been mine but for her treachery."

Then one bright sunny afternoon in early May the two women met—Julia, a wan shadow of her former self, worn out with hard work, depressed by the monotony of her life, indifferent as to her dress and appearance; Maude, a beaming creature in gauzy mauve muslin, with a Watteau skirt, all a-flutter with ribbons, and a voluminous train sweeping in the dust behind her.

"Dear Julia—"

"Maude—Mrs. Tredethlyn!"

Miss Desmond turned as pale as death. The encounter had come upon her very suddenly, and she was neither physically nor mentally able to bear it. She set her teeth and tried to flash the old defiance from her dark eyes. But the light of that once fiery glance died out like the flame of a candle which burns feebly in the glare of the morning sun. Julia was quite worn out by the life she had been leading for the last year and a half. The pride of a Somerset might give way beneath a long course of overwork and indifferent diet.

After that first exclamation of surprise she drew herself to her fullest height, and tried to pass Mrs. Tredethlyn with a bow, and a faint, cold smile of recognition, but Maude stopped her:

"Dearest Julia, if you knew how anxious and unhappy I have been about you, I'm sure you wouldn't want to pass me by. Do let us be friends. The past is forgotten, isn't it? Yes, I'm sure it is. Will you come up-stairs to the picture gallery? that's always a nice solitary place where one can talk. Are those young ladies with you? What very nice little girls! Miss Desmond and I are going up-stairs, dear, to have a chat. Will you come with us?"

The elder of Julia's pupils, to whom this question was addressed, replied only by a stony glare. She was petrified by the audacity of this smiling creature in mauve who dared to take possession of her governess. The youthful mind, soured by a long course of German declensions, is apt to contemplate everything in a gloomy aspect.

Maude and Julia went past poor Haydon's big cold picture, and made their way to a small room which was quite empty. Julia's face had a stern darkness upon it, which might have frightened any one less hopeful than Maude; but that young lady had been surrounded by an atmosphere of love from her cradle upwards, and was entirely unacquainted with the diagnosis of hatred. She despatched the children to look at the pictures in the larger rooms, and then laying her hand caressingly upon Miss Desmond's arm, she said, very earnestly:

"Dearest Julia, I hope you have forgiven me?"

Miss Desmond locked her lips, and stood for some moments with her face quite fixed, staring at vacancy. There were hollow rings round the dark eyes now, and the oval cheeks had lost their smooth outline. Perpetual drudgery and friendless solitude had brought Julia very low; but the Desmond pride still struggled for the mastery over its grim assailant—necessity.

"I don't know that I have anything to forgive," she said after an ominous pause; "Mr. Tredethlyn was free to transfer his affections as often as he chose. I was very glad to read of your marriage, for it was at least satisfactory to find that he had not changed his mind a second time. I do not blame any one but myself, Mrs. Tredethlyn. I should have been wiser than to entrust my happiness to a man who——"

Miss Desmond stopped abruptly. She made a long pause, during which she contemplated Maude almost as if she had been looking for some tender spot in which to plant her dagger.

"I must not forget that he is your husband, and I do not wish to say anything humiliating to you; but I cannot forget that he is not a gentleman. No gentleman would have treated any woman as Mr. Tredethlyn treated me."

If Julia's conscience had a voice it might perhaps have chimed in with an awkward question here—"And would any lady have spread a net to catch a rich husband, Julia, trading on the generosity of his simple nature, and angling for the fortune of a man whose heart was obviously given to another?"

Mrs. Tredethlyn's bright face crimsoned, and her lower lip fell a little. It is not to be supposed that she could be very fond of her husband, but she felt any allusion to his shortcomings almost as keenly as if he had been the incarnation of her girlish dreams. Whatever he was, he was hers, and she was responsible for him.

"If generosity of heart could make a gentleman, Julia," she said, almost entreatingly, "I think Francis would be the first of gentlemen."

Miss Desmond did not condescend to reply to this observation.

"Oh, Julia," Mrs. Tredethlyn said, after another little pause, "how can you be so unkind and unforgiving? Have you forgotten how happy we used to be together long ago at the Cedars? If—if I thought you were pleasantly circumstanced now, I would not worry you with any proffers of friendship; but somehow I cannot think that you are happy. Dear Julia, forgive me for the past and trust me once more."

The stony look in Miss Desmond's face did not melt away under the influence of Maude's tenderness; but presently, with an almost awful suddenness, she sank upon the nearest chair, dropped her face upon her clasped hands, and burst into a passion of tears—convulsive sobs that shook her with their hysterical force. The strong will of the Desmonds asserted itself to the very last, for this passionate outburst was almost noiseless. The slender frame writhed and trembled, the chest heaved, the small hands were clenched convulsively, but there was no vulgar outcry. Miss Desmond recovered herself almost as suddenly as she had given way to her emotion, and drew up her head proudly, though her face was blotted with tears.

"Heaven help me!" she exclaimed, "what a poor weak wretch I am!"

"You will let me be your friend again, won't you, Julia? You'll come and live with me once more? You need see very little of Mr. Tredethlyn if you dislike him. He and I are quite fashionable people I assure you, and he is very seldom at home. I shall be so glad to have you with me. I go a great deal into society, and I know you like society, Julia. Come, dear, let us be friends again, just as we used to be in the dear old times."

Maude gave a little sigh—she was apt now and then to think sentimentally of that remote period of her existence, some four or five years back, when she had believed that the happiest fate that heaven could award her would be a union with Harcourt Lowther. Even now, though she had schooled herself to think of him coldly, though she tried very hard not to think of him at all, the memory of the old time would come back; the picture of the home that might have been—the little cottage in St. John's Wood—the long quiet evenings, made delightful by genial companionship—the pleasant hours devoted to art—the dear old concertante duets by Mozart and Beethoven—the "two souls with but a single thought, two hearts that beat as one," the images of these things were apt to arise suddenly before her in the midst of her frivolous pleasure in her fine dresses, and gorgeous house, and admiring friends.

"Dear Julia," she said, winding one arm caressingly about the Irish girl, "you will come, won't you?"

"Yes," Miss Desmond answered, "I will come if you want me. But I must come upon a new footing. This time I must work for my wages. I have been a hired slave ever since I left your father's house. I will be your servant, Mrs. Tredethlyn, if you choose to hire me."

"Julia, you will be my friend, just as you used to be."

"No," cried Miss Desmond, with a resolute gesture of her hand, "no; if you want a companion to keep your keys and attend to your lap-dogs, to finish fancy work that you have begun and grown tired of, to read French novels to you when you want to be read to sleep, to write your letters of invitation, to take the bass in your duets, or carry an occasional message to your milliner—if you want a person of this kind, I am quite willing to be that person."

"Julia!"

"I will come to you on these terms, or not all."

"You shall come to me on any terms you please so long as you come."

"Very well, then, I will come. My present employer gives me sixty guineas a year, and makes me work harder than a pack-horse. You can give me the same money if you think my services worth so much. I will make arrangements for leaving my present situation. A housemaid left the other day, and I believe she gave her mistress a month's notice—I suppose the same rule will hold good with me—I will come to you at the end of that time, unless you change your mind in the meanwhile."

"I shall not change my mind; I only wish you could come to me to-day. Take my card, dear, and give me yours."

"I have no cards," answered Miss Desmond. "I have neither name nor place in the world, and have no need of visiting cards."

She wrote her address upon the back of an envelope and gave it to Mrs. Tredethlyn. To the last her manner was cold and ungracious; but Maude parted from her, happy in the idea that she had rescued her old companion from a life of drudgery.

"Why should I not be her hired slave? I shall still have the right to hate her," thought Miss Desmond, as she went back to Bayswater with her gloomy charges.

NEW BOOKS, MUSIC, &c.

ONLY A CLOD. By MISS BRADDON. New York: Dick & Fitzgerald.

The readers of our paper have had a chance to estimate this absorbing production as it has appeared from week to week in our columns. Many of them will echo the prevailing opinion that it stands foremost among the thrilling creations of Miss Braddon's genius.

FRANK B. CONVERSE'S BANJO INSTRUCTOR WITHOUT A MASTER. New York: Dick & Fitzgerald.

This is a popular work, intended to instruct tyros in the agreeable art of banjo-playing. A number of popular tunes are analyzed and thoroughly explained.

ILLUSTRATED LIFE, SERVICES, MARTYRDOM AND FUNERAL OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers.

A most convenient compendium of events which are all fresh and stirring in the public mind. The compiler has done his duty with fairness and a considerable degree of ability.

The house of Petersons is one of the most enterprising in the world. They are always foremost in producing reading for the million—that which is not "caviare to the general," but which any person of sense can enjoy and appreciate. Their stock is immense, their enterprise unflagging, and their success eminent and increasing. Their editions of novels and standard works are conspicuous for correctness and beauty.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.

THE entire debt of the United States is officially reported, under date of May 31st, at a little over twenty-six hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars. The exact figures are as follows:

$1,108,113,842	interest payable in gold.
1,053,476,371	interest payable in currency.
472,829,270	treasury notes not bearing interest.
$2,635,208,753.

The annual interest in coin and currency together is over one hundred and twenty-four millions, which is an inconsiderable fraction less than six per cent. on the interest-paying portion. We are now able, for the first time, to assign a proximate limit to the debt, and to estimate very closely its yearly burden on the country. When all the expenses of the war are settled, the mass will doubtless be near three thousand millions of dollars. The policy of the Government will be to convert the Treasury notes into bonds with as little delay as possible. At six per cent., which is the present average rate, our annual interest will be one hundred and eighty millions of dollars. The estimated receipts for the year ending June 30, 1866, are three hundred and ninety-six millions, as follows:

From Customs	$70,000,000
From Internal Duties	300,000,000
From Lands	1,000,000
From Miscellaneous sources	25,000,000
	$396,000,000

The Treasury estimate of expenses for the same year, exclusive of war and navy purposes, is:

For the civil service	$33,082,097
For pensions and Indians	14,196,050

If we add to this amount the interest on the debt, and allow seventy-five millions for army and navy expenses, we have a total requirement of three hundred and two millions. We may, therefore, either reduce our taxes one-third, or have an excess of near one hundred millions to apply in liquidation of the debt. Sound policy dictates that we shall reduce the scale of taxation and keep it low until the productive powers of the country are fully restored to activity, rather than to push immediately upon liquidation. We shall then have the whole country from which to reap income, instead of the half as now, and the reduced scale, spread over double the surface, will not need to be enlarged.

This is certainly a very satisfactory exhibition. We announce it as a fact capable of demonstration, that our taxation might this day be reduced one-third, or, if the five hundred millions of treasury notes be not funded, to fully one-half of the present rates, and the gradual extinction of the debt go on successfully. If our allowance for the army and navy appears small, we have, on the other hand, made none for increased revenue from imports, on which we may probably depend for twenty-five millions more than is officially set down. The treasury estimate of but one million of receipts from the sale of public lands was made under the depression of war. Now that is relieved and peace is established, and with an active tide of emigration, we may expect them to assume something like the old proportions of eight millions a year.—Evening Post.

A YOUNG New England mamma, on the important occasion of making her little boy his first pair of colored trowsers, conceived the idea that it would be more economical to make them of the same dimensions behind and before, so that they might be changed about and wear evenly—and so fashioned them. Their effect, when donned by the little victim, was ridiculous in the extreme. Papa, at first sight of the baggy garment, so "fearfully and wonderfully made," burst into a roar of laughter, and exclaimed: "Oh, my dear, how could you have the heart to do it? Why, the poor little fellow won't know whether he's going to school or coming home."

RUINS OF THE CONFEDERATE ARSENAL, RICHMOND, VA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

GEN. GRANT IN NEW YORK.

LIEUT. GEN. GRANT arrived in this city at six o'clock Wednesday morning, June 7th, accompanied by his family and part of his staff. The entire party put up at the Astor House, an enthusiastic ovation was tendered the lieutenant general by our citizens. In the forenoon and afternoon he held levees in the parlors of the Astor House, at which some 6,000 persons attended. The usual custom of hand-shaking was adopted, and the general was compelled to undergo this severe ordeal for several hours. At four o'clock a dinner took place at the hotel, at which 80 gentlemen sat down. In the afternoon the general drove out to the Central Park, and at eight o'clock called at the rooms of the Union League. At night the general was serenaded by the Seventh Regiment Band. Speeches were made upon the occasion by Major Gen. John A. Logan and Senator Chandler.

An immense meeting was held the same night at the Cooper Institute for the purpose of expressing the joy of the people over the restoration of peace and the unity of the nation, their determination to uphold the Government and their confidence in President Johnson. The proceedings were most enthusiastic. Gen. Grant was present, and was wildly welcomed by the audience. Speeches were made by a number of gentlemen, including Major Gen. Logan, commander of the Army of the Tennessee, and Major Gen. Frank P. Blair, commanding the 17th army corps.

On Thursday morning the general proceeded in a little dispatch steamer to West Point.

Here he had an interesting meeting with Gen. Scott, in which the opposing parties strove to outdo each other in kindness.

After an excellent dinner, the general proceeded to Culburn's residence to await the review.

This review and exhibition drill of the cadets of the academy deserves a more extended notice than our limits will permit. Suffice it to say that the music was splendid; the appearance of the cadets, in their neat uniform of gray and white, was admirable, and their drill and movements the acme of perfection. The programme consisted of the regulation review in column, at "rear open order," the marching calls in common time and at the double-quick. The battalion was afterwards put through a choice variety of tactical manœuvres, by their commandant, Col. Black. The performance evinced the careful drill and discipline of the cadets to a remarkable degree. After the review and drill, the customary dress parade was gone through with, and the parade being dismissed by the cadet-adjutant, Mr. Hull, the graduating class for the present year ground arms, and marched forward to greet the lieutenant general, who was supported by Lieut. Gen. Scott. This part of the day's proceedings was a most pleasing sight. Gen. Grant then shook hands with the class in turn, addressing each, as they were introduced by Gen. Culburn, in a few kind words, sending each young cadet away with a cheerful and happy face.

THE NEW YORK YACHT CLUB.

THE regular annual regatta of this old and excellent Yachting Association came off on the 8th instant, from their starting place, opposite a point known as the Orr's Head, on Long Island shore, about two miles this side of Fort Hamilton.

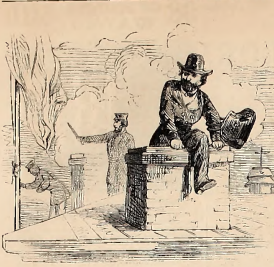
The sloop Geraldine (also out-rod) did not make her appearance, the illness of her owner, Mr. Dickerson, preventing.

At half-past 11 o'clock the signal was given for the start—both classes at once. The Annie gained something over the Bonita, by deferring hoisting her jib until after she had swung her head down with the tide and started ahead, while the Calypso took the lead of the schooners, followed by the Brenda, both setting their main-top-mast-stay-sails, flying-jibs, and jib-topsails, and the others following suit until they seemed almost hidden under the clouds of canvas. The sight preceded at this time was very beautiful.



Shortly after leaving the Narrows, the wind freshened, but it did not last long, and soon the boats were again almost drifting along, the huge sails barely filled, and colors clinging to the mast. Suddenly the Magic, which had worked well over to the east bank, had a fine breeze from the S. S. E., and laid her course direct for the Spit Buoy without tacking. The Annie's catching the breeze soon after, there instantly arises a question as to which will turn the buoy first, which is soon decided by the Annie reaching it at 1:21.7, followed by the Magic, Maria, Wakeman, Bonita, Juanita, Chance, Haze, Calypso, Cornelia, Silvia, Breeze, Pauline and Josephine, which all turned the buoy, although not all in the race. The time taken at the buoy was:

Schooner Annie...	1: 21.07	Sloop Juanita.....	1: 19.10
Schooner Magic...	1: 21.41	Schooner Haze.....	1: 14.00
Schooner Maria...	1: 14.32	Schooner Calypso..	1: 25.07
Sloop Bonita.....	1: 19.10	Schooner Breeze....	1: 30.40

The turn of the Bonita and Juanita was remarkably close, and elicited much admiration for the former. After turning the buoy, the wind again became light and hauled a little more to the east, obliging all the yachts to make a tack before weathering the lightship, which was the next point to be gained. After getting outside of the point of the Hook, the wind freshened considerably again, and some of the most exciting sail-ling of the day took place. The Magic had shot well ahead, but somewhat to leeward, followed at some distance by the Maria, while the Annie, although astern, was far to windward, and the question was again raised as to which would turn first, and was again decided in favor of the Annie, the little Eclipse being again in company, and turning almost at the same minute, followed by the Edna, Magic and Maria. The turning of these boats was a very pleasant sight—as everything was close-hauled, everything set, and everything drawing.

Soon after the leading yachts reached the Spit, however, the wind again became light, and at times almost died away. At two o'clock, the Maria and Magic were near Fort Lafayette, the latter some distance ahead, when, with a heavy thunder shower to the west—of which only a few drops reached us—the Maria got a nice little breeze and began to overhaul the Magic. In vain the latter reset her main-topmast, cap'sail and jib top-sail, which she had just taken in. The Maria slowly but surely gained on her, and passed her a short distance above the forts. The breeze of wind which had been of such service to Commodore Stevens' yacht, soon spent its force, and the remainder of the race was pretty much adrift. The time only of the three first boats was taken, the others being so far behind as to render it certain that they could not be winners. The result is as follows:

	Allowance
	Start.	Arrive.	Time.	m. s.	Net Time.
Schr. Maria	11.39	5.11.50	5.31.50	add 31.17	5.19.07
Schr. Magic	11.39	5.11.05	5.44.05	sub. 7.29	5.36.36
Sloop Annie	11.50	5.39	6 0. 0	sub. 36.26	5.23.34

The winners in their respective classes are the Magic and the Annie, both old favorites, and to whom success is no stranger. The Maria was sailed by Commodore Barker, and the Magic by Captain Brown, both well known among yachtsmen, while we believe the Annie was handled by her owners, the Messrs. Livingstone. The prizes consist of a very elegant but quite plain silver pumabowl and a cigar casket of the same material. The feet of the latter are formed by four dolphins standing, as in mast with that queer fish, on their heads. On the lid of it is an ornamental snatch-cake is formed by a sailor sitting on a capstan playing a fife: to the capstan is attached the end of a small coil of cable, on which is a snatch-block.

A FLEET OF AMERICAN WAR VESSELS IN HAVANA.

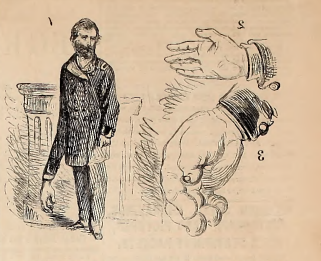
On the morning of the 29th ultimo a fleet, composed of the United States steamer Susquehanna, the gunboats Chippewa, Pahkee, Monticello, Hendo, and the monitors Monadnock and Canonicus, arrived at Havana, under command of Admiral R. Gordon.

About 3,000 persons visited the squadron in one day. Many of the foreign consuls went to pay their respects to the admiral, and received the usual salutes.

THE NEW ARMY TELEGRAPH.

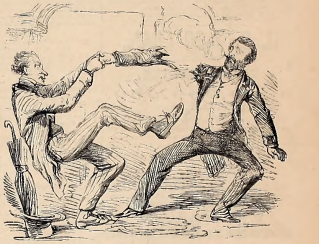
In the Crimean war the French and English did many things which demonstrated how largely science had become a very important part of war. The laying down a railroad from Balaklava to the harbor was considered a grand achievement, and the feat of Marshal Canrobert telegraphing from Constantinople to Paris for orders was looked upon as the ne plus ultra of science. The last four years, however, have shown that, with our usual go-aheadiveness, we have outstripped all the world in our constrivances, and so far as war can be divested of its horror by science and the arts, we have done so. Railroads have been laid through forests till then impassable, and the telegraph has followed, as a matter of course. We give a sketch of General Gillmore's engineers putting up the telegraph wires on Morris Island beach. The modus operandi is so plain that it needs no description. The wire, the poles, and everything, requisite to form a perfect telegraph are carried on the wagon, and as the poles are fixed the wire is paid out, and the thing is complete.

TROTTING ON THE FASHION COURSE, L. I.



A CAPITAL trot came off on the above course on Tuesday afternoon, May 30, for a purse of $200, with a stake of $50 each, play or pay, mile heats, best three in five, in harness. There were four entries, to Dairy g. m. Blonde, Hiram Woodruff's g. g., better known as Cregan's gray jobking; J. Lovett's b. g. Shark, and Dan Mace's b. g. Hambletonian; the latter, however, did not start. Shark was the favorite, selling in pools before the first heat for $120; Blonde, $115, and the gray gelding for $80. Blonde won very easily in three straight heats in 2:36, 2:35, 2:33.

The winner, who made her first and successful debut on the turf in the above race, was sired by Mr. Sam Hoagland's Grey Messenger, dam by Abdallah, and is six years old. Gray Messenger died some four years ago, but his fine blood and pedigree is well maintained by his son Ledger, dam Lady Moscow.



ANECDOTE OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.—A woman in a faded shawl and hood, somewhat advanced in life, at length was admitted in her turn to the President. Her husband and three sons—all she had in the world—enlisted. Her husband had been killed, and she had come to ask the President to release to her the oldest son. Being satisfied of the truthfulness of her story, he said, "Certainly, if her prop was taken away she was justly entitled to one of her boys." He immediately wrote an order for the discharge of the young man. The poor woman thanked him very gratefully, and went away. On reaching the army she found that this son had been in a recent engagement, was wounded, and taken to an hospital. She found the hospital, but the boy was dead, or died while she was there. The person in charge made a memorandum of the facts upon the back of the President's order, and almost because bereaved, the poor woman found her way again into his presence.

He was much affected by her appearance and story, and said, "I know what you wish her to do now, and I shall do it without your asking. I shall release to you your second son." Upon this he took up his pen and commenced writing the order. While he was writing, the poor woman stood by his side, the tears trickling down her face, and passed her hand softly over his head, stroking his locks as I have seen a fond mother do to a son. By the time he had finished writing, his own heart and eyes were full. He handed her the paper, "Now," said he, "you have one and I one of the other two left: this is no more than right." She took the paper, and reverently placing her hand again upon his head, she tearfully, upon her checks, said—"God Almighty bless you, Mr. President. May you live a thousand years, and may you always be the head of this great nation!"

A PARLOR NOVEL.
MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.
BY MRS. GORE,
Author of "Castles in the Air," etc. etc.

"Another of Mrs. Gore's delightful prose fictions—A PARLOR NOVEL—just suited by its refinement and delicacy of tone for the parlor table."—Boston Courier. "Admirable for the perusal of 'Mothers and Daughters.'"—London Examiner.

"Mrs. Gore combines moral instruction with pleasure and interest, and has produced a pure work in a few chapters—a book for our homes—full of charming sentiment and true feeling, and presenting a lively and agreeable picture of female character."—London Spectator.

"In her delineations of female character Mrs. Gore is peculiarly felicitous. She never more so than in the present instance. 'Mothers and Daughters' is one of the most fascinating novels of the day—a production that does honour alike to the principles and genius of the author."—London Literary Gazette.

Price 50 cents. Mailed, free of postage, on receipt of price.

ARRANDALE & CO., Successors to ARRANDALE, NOT BROADWAY, NEW YORK!
Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each!
In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the metropolitan markets, we have been induced to the step of having out of the supply of custom, a large quantity of Watches, Jewelry, etc., which, previously for the English market has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ONCE, REGARDLESS OF COST.
Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the above Foreign Manufacturers, have received upon a Great Gift Appointment to be divided entirely as the buyers may choose.
CERTIFICATES of the various articles are first put into envelopes and thoroughly mixed. The envelopes, all sealed, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus distributing them at random.
On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have for ONE DOLLAR. You will then send us the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may have ONE, THREE, FIVE or ELEVEN (all or any) Set of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.
NO GIFT WORTH LESS THAN ONE DOLLAR.
In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, paper, postage and clerking business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the purchase is made. Purchasers will be sent by mail, $1; eleven for $5; thirty for $10; sixty-five for 10; and a hundred for $20.
AGENTS.—We want Agents in every regiment, and in every Post Office in the country, to whom liberal terms as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered for distribution. Circulars and references to be sent. Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate sold, and remit 15 cents to us. Address
ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.
GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining a valuable gift watch, chain, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway. They have an immense variety of articles, varying in value, and all are offered for $1 each. The distribution is by fairly doing away with the sale of certificates of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, which are all numbered by the agency, and then are distributed with the article, which will certainly be worth the money. Persons wishing to try their luck will find excellent inside tips of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, New York Herald, June 4, 1865.
Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us as men fulfilling to the letter their every worthy of public confidence.—New York Sunday Atlantic Journal, June 11, 1865.
We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s factory for Gift Distribution, a splendid and lengthy assortment of fashionable and valuable jewellery of the newest patterns. We also perused a long catalogue of silver-plate, and understand that the whole of these costly articles are to be given away to parties who will remit one dollar each for their advertisement.—New York Evening Express, June 7, 1865.

We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s factory for Gift Distribution, a splendid and lengthy assortment of fashionable and valuable jewellery of the newest patterns. We also perused a long catalogue of silver-plate, and understand that the whole of these costly articles are to be given away to parties who will remit one dollar each for their advertisement.—New York Evening Express, June 7, 1865.
In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of ARRANDALE & CO.'s Distribution of watches, jewellery and silver-ware. In payment of that advertisement they receive a very small sum for the jewellery advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceed our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Jacksonville), Aug. 17, 1864.
The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 28, 1864, one of our fully subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 30 articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

France in Mexico.

Mexico promises to be the rock on which the bark bearing the fortunes of the Third Napoleon will be wrecked. Successful up to this time, not from great foresight or profound judgment, but rather from luck and happy combinations of circumstances, Louis Napoleon now finds himself for the first time enveloped in difficulties which thicken rather than dissolve before his eyes, and which are not limited to a distant field, but invade his palace and involve his family. Not only does Mexico obstinately refuse to be "regenerated" through the persuasion of French bayonets, but offers a resistance probably more vigorous now than ever before. This calls for men and money, for the Austrian puppet who mimics imperial state in Mexico, is as barren of one as he is bankrupt of the other. Both these must be supplied by France—if at all—for Austria takes no real interest in the French scheme, as this Mexican affair exclusively is, and besides has no resources to spare. Poor old Leopold can only furnish a handful of mercenaries, who must also be paid by France, and who have proved to be no match for the Mexican soldiers, by whom they have been very effectually cut up. The annual revenues of Mexico are insufficient to cover a month's cost of the ridiculous empire.

Here, then, is the first, and perhaps grandest of all the difficulties that beset Napoleon—the financial one. France is now restive under any addition to her burthens, for an object in which the nation has failed to discover either honor or profit, and money for Maximilian's current expenses can only be raised through a gambling lottery scheme, which, if started here, would subject its originators and management to indictment and the penitentiary. The notion that the invasion of Mexico was going to result in making the country another California, has been rudely dispelled. No one believes in the permanency or power of the "empire," and all the bona fide emigrants who have gone there from Europe during the three years the French have been in the country, do not number as many as land in New York in a single day.

Another Napoleonic difficulty is the restiveness of the so-called Mexican emperor, who sees better than any one else, the absurdity of his position and its untenableness. He feels that he is only a puppet in the hands of a French marshal, with little of volition, and less of power, and if report speaks truly, has already intimated to his master his desire to withdraw from his uncomfortable, not to say perilous position. Perilous he evidently regards it, in view of the close of our civil war, as evinced in the haste with which his confidential agents flew to Europe to sound the alarm, and appeal for men and money. It is stated on as good authority as could be adduced in matters of this kind, that he has asked for a reinforcement of 100,000 men as a sine qua non in the reduction of the country, and to meet the forces of the republic, which it is supposed will be greatly augmented and strengthened by recruits from the United States. Such a contribution would not be sanctioned by the public opinion of France, and the cost would be a serious addition to the already heavy burthens of the country.

This public opinion has already found expression, not through the feeble voice of a weak opposition in the French Chambers, but in the imperial circle itself. Prince Napoleon in a public speech, since widely distributed in pamphlet form, has not only extolled the Monroe Doctrine as one right and proper for the United States to maintain, but claims for it the sanctity (in French eyes) of being one of the "idées Napoleonnes." He affirms that it was the policy of the great emperor to make the United States great, and the friend and ally of France in America, and hence he gave up Louisiana to her for a song and without a sigh. His policy, according to this interpreter, is as much to-day the policy of France as it was half a century ago.

For this speech Prince Napoleon has been harshly rebuked by the emperor, and he has consequently, in curt terms, resigned his position as vice-president of the Imperial Council and all his other positions under the Empire, and, it is said, retired to Switzerland. This action of the prince is important, if in no other sense than that it furnishes a nucleus around which the opponents of Louis Napoleon's power in Mexico may centre. It gives a form and prestige to the opposition in France that it could not otherwise secure, and which will find expression, in spite of the machinery through which free thought is kept down in the French capitol.

The course of the emperor, under these difficulties, cannot be predicted. Many believe that he will leave Maximilian to his own resources, in which case his tenure of power would be only a question of hours. He cannot exist a day except with the support of French bayonets. If, on the other hand, Louis Napoleon persists in supporting a government alien in every sense to the Mexicans, he must be prepared to maintain a long, expensive and bloody war. The Mexicans are far from being subdued; they have taken new vigor from the happy termination of our civil war, and without any direct aid from this country, can sustain themselves against any force that any European power could bring against them, except at cost of bankruptcy and revolution at home. The people of the United States believe and expect that the French will retire from Mexico quietly and in season. They have no wish, by word or deed, to raise any questions of pride in the matter, or to have it appear to be anything else than the result of sound judgment and prudence, on the part of the emperor. They do not wish to have the act considered as in any degree compelled, or even hastened by them. The American Government desires it to be effected in this way, for it wants to avoid any issue with France, which, however, it well knows must sooner or later arise in case the French insist on keeping up a farcical empire on our borders. Louis Napoleon cannot be unaware that the Monroe Doctrine is a principle fixed and permanent in the American policy, receiving the fullest approval and sanction in the hearts and heads of Americans. It will never be surrendered, and all that we desire is not to be compelled by wanton and persistent violations of it, to enforce it. France has no business in Mexico. She has no interests there, at all comparable with ours. She went there thinking us powerless, dead, and that the principle most sacred in our national creed had disappeared with our unity. The result has proved otherwise. She has also found that the benefits she thought to obtain in Mexico are unreal and illusive. Why then persist in a profitless occupation which outrages the sense of a powerful and friendly nation, and is fraught with constant and mighty danger abroad, and threatens dynastic revolution at home?

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold

Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received for it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of The Chimney Corner was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

The Chimney Corner is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Reconstruction—Suffrage.

The question of the day is that of reconstruction, or how, and under what conditions the rebel states shall resume their place in the Union. The President, all the officers of the Government, the Judiciary, the Army and the Navy, and the nation itself accepts the Emancipation Proclamation of President Lincoln as final and conclusive. That Proclamation, as a military necessity, abolished slavery in all the rebellious States. Slavery exists, therefore, only in Delaware and Kentucky, inasmuch as Maryland and Missouri, the other loyal States that had slaves, have liberated them by their own act. The only object, therefore, that could be gained by the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment prohibiting slavery, would be to free the slaves in Delaware and Kentucky, and to prevent any of the existing or prospective states of the Union from re-establishing slavery as a local institution.

The question now arises, what, under this new order of things, shall be the status of the colored men of the South? In the re-organization of the rebel states, shall they, as a considerable part of the population, have a voice?

Now it is no evidence of hostility to the freedmen—no evidence that a man may not have been a thorough abolitionist—the fact that he may hesitate to put in the hands of the lately emancipated and uneducated slave, that powerful instrument for good or for evil, the ballot. There are many of our best and wisest men—we may, perhaps, say the great mass of American citizens—feeling the responsibilities of government, and seeking the welfare of the nation, who believe that the sacred right of suffrage has been too greatly extended, and that laxity of political morality, and rank corruption generally have been the consequence. The loose extension of this inestimable privilege has been the work of demagogues, who derive their position and influence from the votes of the ignorant and the vile. Look at the infamy which characterises the politics and enters into every department of the government of this city! Does any one doubt that it is the consequence of a reckless and indiscriminate extension of the suffrage to the uneducated, irresponsible, corrupt mass of riff-raff, alien and domestic, felons and paupers, which crowds the metropolis? These are the mere instruments of unscrupulous demagogues, and their votes are given without discrimination, influenced only by prejudice, passion or bribes.

It is true that under a system like ours, it is difficult to fix justly the qualifications of a voter. It is probably too late to revise our existing system, and it is perhaps best to submit to its evils, and trust to counteracting influences, than to attempt to change it. But there are evils grave and patent to all men, and in any question of the extension of the franchise, these ought to be considered, and their augmentation, if possible, prevented.

A republic is the highest effort of human intelligence and honesty. It is based on popular education and morality, which find expression and take effect through the ballot. Suffrage is the toga virilis, and should be held as the highest and most sacred privilege of republican manhood. Its exercise, abstractly speaking, should be conceded only to those who comprehend the principles of republicanism, appreciate and cherish its objects, and whom education and reflection have qualified to decide on public affairs with intelligence. That the late slaves of the South, with few exceptions, do not meet these conditions is certain, not through their own fault, but of the system which denied them the rights of men, denied them the institution of marriage, and made any attempt at their education penal.

If therefore, the question of extending to them the right of suffrage were to come before the nation, pure and simple, it would undoubtedly be negatived by nine-tenths of our people as inexpedient, if not dangerous. We should consider, and rightly, that the mental and moral condition of the present generation of freedmen disqualifies them, as a whole, for the exercise of a privilege so important and potential.

But unfortunately the war has surrounded what would otherwise have been an easy question with considerations of such great and pressing moment, that we cannot act on it in the abstract. The circumstances of the South are such, that a reorganization of the rebel states, their re-consolidation in the Union, and the security of the national integrity—in fact everything we have fought for—may depend upon our at once investing that large part of the southern people, lately slaves, with a power at the polls corresponding with that which they brought to the standard of the nation in the field. They helped to fight our battles; they must help to secure the fruits of our victory. They helped to solve the questions of war; they must help to resolve those of peace. Such, at any rate, is the opinion of a large part of our people, and it is gaining ground among all classes and parties.

The fact is that the doctrine of secession and four years of bloody war have corrupted and demoralised the rebel states, and although it is the avowed purpose of the government to confine their reorganization in the hands of loyal men, yet it is notorious that these, unless the colored men, who are all loyal, are called in, will be voted down ten to one by the men who participated in the butchery at Fort Pillow, stood guard at Andersonville, and since the disappearance of the last armed resistance in the field have blown up the Sultana, laid a fourth of Mobile in ruins, and sought to effect similar hellish results in Nashville and Chattanooga. To subdue these enemies of the nation in the field we called the negro to our aid, and to secure the fruits of our struggle, against the same enemies now armed with the ballot instead of the bayonet, we must again appeal to the same faithful ally. The participants in the rebellion will not be converted into loyal citizens by any machinery of oaths; they will subscribe to anything you may frame, swear to abide by anything you may dictate, and then cut your throat if they can, or, with perjury black on their souls, vote you down at the polls. Weak, good-natured people may disbelieve this; but ask any returned soldier, any man who was in the South before the war, or has been there since its commencement, if he does not believe this to be literally true. We will rest the case on his answer.

This is a matter of immediate and vital importance. The abolition of slavery augments the basis of representation in the South to the extent of fourteen new members of Congress, and as many presidential electors. Not three-fifths of the blacks, as before, but the whole number must now be counted in the representative population. What have we gained in the war—we speak now apart from the rights of the black man—if we are to have seventeen representatives of southern chivalry, such as we used to see in Washington, added to the number formerly to be found in the halls of Congress? How long before allying themselves with some doughface or traitorous Northern minority, or should find them in the ascendant in the nation, and planning another rebellion?

We must kill, not scotch the serpent. Lopping off the tail will not answer, we must crush the head. We shall evince unparalleled ignorance and inexcusable blindness, if we leave this task to the handful of loyal white men in the lately insurgent states. They are unequal to the task. They must be strengthened, and that can only be through an extension of suffrage to the loyal black men. We cannot shirk the alternative. It is puerile and cowardly to shut our eyes to the issue.

In thus strengthening and giving life and power to loyalty in the South, it is not necessary, and it certainly would not be wise, to bestow the suffrage indiscriminately. A large part of the negroes are unquestionably unfit to exercise it intelligently. But there is another great part quite as capable of exercising it intelligently as the major portion of southern whites, restored to citizenship by the amnesty proclamation. To those we may turn with propriety now, and leave further concessions to be made gradually and under conditions such as experience may suggest as just and feasible.

A daily contemporary, recognising, as we do, the exigencies of the time, suggests:

"We would give the suffrage at once to four classes of southern negroes. First and emphatically, to every negro who has borne arms in the cause of the United States; second, to every negro who owns real estate; third, to every negro who can read and write; and fourth, to every negro who had belonged to any religious organization or church for five years before the war. These points would cover every one that ought to vote, and they would insure, in every negro voter, a spirit of manhood as well as discipline, some practical shrewdness, intellectual development, and moral consciousness and culture. It is well worth the consideration of the President whether something like this should not be included in the scheme of reconstruction."

This, or something like, would probably excuse the return of a large majority of loyal men to Congress, from the Southern States, when they shall be reinstated in the Union. Without this, or something like it, we may look for confusion and disorder in Congress and the country, if not disaster to the nation. Men must look at the prospect before them steadily and calmly, and not with bigotry or prejudice. We have sacrificed many cherished proclivities to save the country; we can afford to lay a few more on the altar of patriotism to perpetuate it.

The French empire has escaped a great calamity. The emperor has made a demonstration that is worthy of Cæsar and his historian. The glories of Boulogne and Strasburg fade before his later achievement. He is a vigilant as well as an energetic ruler, is this Napoleon III. He is not appalled in the face of danger. He knew how to preserve law and order, and secure the stability of his throne. Not long ago a popular two-cent subscription was started by the workmen of the city of Nantes for a gold medal, to be presented to Mrs. Lincoln, and to bear the following inscription:

"Liberty, equality, fraternity. To Lincoln, twice chosen President of the United States. From the grateful democracy of France. Lincoln, the honest, abolished slavery, re-established the Union, saved the republic without veiling the statute of liberty. He was assassinated the 14th of April, 1865."

About the 30th of April, when the number of the subscriptions had reached 11,120, the subscriptions were seized by the police, who stated that the scheme was to be stopped everywhere in France. We hope the imperial slumbers are no longer disturbed. The imperial treasury is richer by several bushels of bronze sous. We suggest that they be handed over to the pauper Maximilian in Mexico, who needs them. What if the workmen had succeeded in sending a medal to a widow in the west? Who can conceive what the empire has escaped through the timely vigor of its ruler?

In reply to a letter from our minister in Italy, thanking him for having named his grandson "Lincoln," Garibaldi wrote:

"The name of Lincoln, like that of Christ, makes the beginning of a glorious era in the history of humanity, and I am proud to perpetuate in my family the name of the great emancipator. The journals and the men who have opposed the cause of the great Republic are like the ass of the fable that kicked the lion, thinking him dead; but now that they see her rise again in all her majesty, they will change their language. The American question is vital for the liberty of the world, and its approaching solution must rejoice the hearts of honest men."

The people of Leon, the capital of Nicaragua, have published an address on the death of President Lincoln, from which we quote the following paragraph:

"Rest in peace, illustrious chief of liberty! Thy name will stand crowned high with virtues, foremost among future generations, and be immortal as the heroes! Thy compatriots will turn their eyes from the bloody sight that represents the rebellion of the South, and follow the path which thou hast traced, until, in spite of oligarchies, monarchies and aristocracies, republican equality, the American Union, the absolute abolition of slavery, and the triumph of democracy which the God-man inaugurated at Golgotha, shall be realized on the continent."

There is no concession likely to be so fatal as that of limiting the punishment of treason to mere disappointment in effecting its objects. John Mitchell, an Irish refugee, who came to this country and took the oath of allegiance, afterwards repudiated it and cast his lot with the rebels. He was one of the most virulent and vindictive of the Richmond editors, while the war lasted. At the close, with rare impudence, he came to this city and became one of the editors of a notorious copperhead journal, in the office of which he was arrested some days ago and sent to Fortress Monroe to stand his trial for treason. Before going he published a letter unmatched in sophistry and impudence. We give an extract:

"So long as a Southern Confederacy existed I was a Confederate, a secessionist, or what some persons choose to term a rebel. From the moment of Gen. Johnston's surrender to Gen. Sherman, at Greensborough, I perceived that the cause of the Confederacy was utterly lost. There was no longer a Confederate government; it had disappeared from human eyes; and inasmuch as a country cannot be without a government, and the only government then in fact subsisting being the Federal government of the United States, I owed to it, from that instant, full obedience, which obedience I at once yielded in good faith, as I think my fellow citizens at the South very generally did at the same time, and for the same reason. I am therefore no longer a secessionist nor a rebel, but a Unionist and a lawful citizen."

He will yield the United States "full obedience," and be "a Unionist and a lawful citizen" until he can get up, or help to get up another rebellion! In case that fails, all right, "a Unionist and lawful citizen" again, until the next chance, and so on "without end."

Prof. Agassiz, with the scientific gentlemen accompanying him, arrived at Rio de Janeiro on the 22d of April and were most kindly received. The Emperor sent a boat alongside of the steamer to take the party on shore, and in the evening had a long interview with Mr. Agassiz. The Secretary of the Treasury of Brazil, gave orders to have the baggage and instruments of the party passed unopened at the Custom House, and every courtesy was extended to the members of the expedition by the officials of the Brazilian Government.

THE following jeu d'esprit is published in a London paper apropos of the success of the French horse "Gladiator" in winning the great Derby race:

Cockadoodledo, Jean!
Ha! mon Bull cheri
Ciel! je ne moque pas mal
Des Anglais sans esprit.
Vanquished on your proper ground
N'est-ce pas, mon chou?
Cockadoodledo, Jean,
Cockadoodledo!

Que je suis content, Jean!
Heureux dans cette chance,
Vive le Gladiateur, Jean,
Vive toujours La France!
Enfin she evenge herself,
Ce Sacre Vaterloo!
Cockadoodledoo, Jean,
Cockadoodledo!

THE London Spectator correctly indicates some of the motives of the systematic misrepresentation of the United States in England during the war—misrepresentations hushed only for the moment by the shock of President Lincoln's death. It says:

"The great sources of the radical perversion of English public opinion hitherto on American affairs—sources again showing signs of fresh activity—have been two: the excessive tact, secresy and activity of the Confederate agents in this country in poisoning the sources of opinion, and the immense vantage-ground given to them by the predisposing dread felt in England of the growing power of the Union, and the wish to see it broken up. The latter, or selfish ground, has far too much hold on the comfortable classes of this country; but it would not have twisted the English estimate of everything, as it has done, without a mocking Confederate Mephistopheles to pre-occupy the middle class ear with his interpretations of the past and anticipations of the future. * * * * The Confederates see that English eyes are beginning to open to the true state of the political issues between North and South, and accordingly they strike again the old chords of national fear and pique, and try to push us back into the old unjust frame of thought towards the Union, by persuading us that we are palpably threatened, and stirring us to defiance. But they go too far. They counsel us to rely on joint action with France on American affairs—in other words, to mix ourselves up in the Mexican imbroglio, in order that France may support us in resisting a demand for compensation. This is scarcely a course that will recommend itself to a sagacious middle class. England has never understood the merits of the Mexican case, and has always been heartily glad that we withdrew in time from the French expedition. To purchase an alliance with France in resisting an action for damages, by offering her an alliance in resisting the invasion by another of a vast territory, so recently invaded and conquered by herself, would be indeed to copy the conduct of Glaucus to Diomede, 'to give gold for brass—that which is worth a hundred oxen for that which is worth nine.'"

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER owes an apology to General Hooker. He took an opportunity, at a temperance breakfast in London, when there, to speak of General Hooker as having been intoxicated at the time of the battle of Chancellorsville, leaving the inference, if not conveying it directly, that that disaster was a consequence of the general's fault. The Committee on the Conduct of the War investigated this allegation against General Hooker, and finding no evidence to support it, applied to Mr. Beecher for his authority. This the reverend gentleman declined to give, but tells the committee that "his authority in the case was such as to produce moral conviction." The committee find the allegation false, not upon negative but upon positive testimony. Mr. Beecher had better produce his authority, or stand in the unpleasant position of personally slandering an able and patriotic officer.

THE Franco-Mexican loan, notwithstanding its gambling lottery features, cannot be forced down the throats of the French people. No "gift" scheme could be got up more takingly, but still it will not succeed, for no one has any confidence in the permanency of the Mexican empire. The empire may end in ten days, pretty certainly in as many months. The sickly loan, although bearing a six per cent. interest, vibrates between 46 and 47. In other words, "Max" cannot obtain money, even under a French guarantee, at less than 13 to 14 per cent. per annum, and not much at that. The whole loan, if taken up, including the gross revenues of Mexico, will not keep Maximilian afloat for the current year. And then?

AMONG the recent deaths of notable characters abroad is announced that of Charles Waterton, of Walton Hall, Yorkshire, England. He will be remembered as the author of "Wanderings in South America, the Antilles, and North-west of the United States," published in 1812—the last of the old-fashioned picturesque books of travel. His account of skinning a boa-constrictor, with a picture of a negro shinning up the monster, which is suspended to the limb of a high tree, is familiar to "the rising generation," as is also his story of riding an alligator, with its wonderfully archaic woodcut illustration. We are accustomed to think of Waterton as a contemporary of Mungo Park and Captain Cook, and the writer of this was amazed to meet him, some years ago, at an English country-house, hale, fresh and entertaining. He related his experiences as if they were things of yesterday, and we gladly paid him a visit at his curious retreat, Walton Hall, on an island in a lake. The land rises gently from the water on all sides, and is crowned with fine timber. The whole park is inclosed by a formidable wall, to protect the numerous pets which the late owner had collected around him. Birds, beasts and fishes were allowed to range undisturbed in this domain, and were never allowed to be destroyed. It was while watching some of these, on a rustic bridge, that he had a fall, which terminated fatally. He was an elegant Latin scholar, and long ago he wrote his epitaph in that language, a translation of which runs thus: "Pray for the soul of Charles Waterton, born June, 1782, died 18—, whose wearied bones rest here." Waterton died at the age of eighty-three.

ANDREW JOHNSON, of Tennessee, who, though long since a man of fortune and an occupant of the highest offices his state could bestow, would never allow the old sign that was over his door when he was a tailor twenty-one years of age, to be taken down. It still hangs there—"Andrew Johnson, Tailor."

AN original letter of Mr. Howell Cobb, has been brought to light, dated 1857, during the period of the Kansas troubles. Mr. Buchanan will hardly feel complimented now by the following endorsement of his administration which the letter contains. "I repeat to you," says Mr. Cobb, "that the administration of Mr. Buchanan is the most thoroughly identified with our principles and our rights of any that has ever preceded it, and I am willing to stand or fall by the issue."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE veil of diplomatic reserve hides the real chagrin of Europe at the restoration of the Union. It is, however, beginning to treat the downfall of the slave rebellion as une fait accompli, since Holland, France and England have withdrawn from the so-called Confederate power "belligerent rights." Russell, in his official notification, acknowledges that "peace has been restored within the whole territory of which the United States of North America before the commencement of the civil war were in undisturbed possession," and states that as a necessary consequence "her Majesty's several authorities in all ports, harbors and waters must henceforth refuse permission to any vessel of war carrying a Confederate flag to enter such ports, harbors and waters," and must require any such vessels forthwith to depart therefrom within 24 hours. There is, however, an added proviso that the commander of any rebel vessel may divest his vessel of her warlike character and remain within British waters at his own risk.

France continued to be violently agitated on the Mexican question. M. Thiers, the leader of the opposition in the French Chambers, in a speech on the budget, strongly deprecated the continuance of the French intervention in Mexico, urging that by its cessation an annual saving of at least 50,000,000 francs might be effected. La France consoles its readers by arguing that the Monroe doctrine does not apply to Mexico, and that America is too exhausted by previous efforts to engage in a foreign war.

On the authority of the London Times it is stated that France has notified the Washington government that Mexico is under French protection, and that filibustering will be dealt with without mercy.

Details of the war among the South American republics confirm the successes of the Paraguayan forces. The Paraguayan army is estimated at 60,000—the allied forces opposed to them at 75,000 men.

The Princess of Wales has presented to the British nation another prince.

The Empress has refused to accept the resignation of Prince Jerome Napoleon, till she has received the Emperor's instructions. In the meantime Victor Emanuel has suggested a postponement of the prince's visit to his court for the present, as it might complicate his negotiations with his Holiness, with whom Jerome Napoleon is in bad repute.

TOWN GOSSIP.

IF Bishop Berkley were a resident of New York at this time he would probably amend his celebrated aphorism so as to read, "Eastward the Star of Empire takes its way." All the American stars seem to be gravitating towards Europe. The theatrical stars, military stars, literary stars, fashionable stars, and the Star Spangled Banner are all cutting loose from their American moorings and steering eastward. If any one doubts that the last named star is now tending eastward, let him read the account of Commodore Goldsborough's preparations for a naval expedition to the Mediterranean—fifty of our most powerful war vessels, including half a dozen monitors. If the advent of all this Americanism in Europe does not awaken our somnolent transatlantic neighbors to the fact that we are a "great beeples," then we may write them down as the genuine Rip Van Winkles.

The closing of the war is, of course, the primary cause of this general migration to Europe. During the past four years the financial uncertainty in this country, the anxiety about the issue of the contest, and, perhaps, more particularly the sympathy which nearly every European state has manifested for the rebellion, doubtless caused the suspension of visits to those countries from American tourists. But all these things have passed away. Foreign nations have learned that as a people we are in the military van instead of rear, and that man will now be honored in Europe who can say, "I am an American citizen."

But summer attractions at home are not forgotten. The watering places and the various other resorts to which citizens rush to escape the torrid and pestilential atmosphere that characterizes New York during the heated term, are likely to be well patronized during the season which is just opening. The old habitués will, of course, be there, and there will be a large addition from that class who have been thrown to the financial surface by the force of war. The majority of this class are of somewhat uncertain antecedents, to be sure, but relying on their metalic talismans—gold and brass—they expect to be shown to a high seat in the temple of fashion.

As a natural consequence to this outflow to Europe and the domestic summer resorts, the city is already becoming dull and insipid. The warm rays of the sun seem to operate upon the vivacity of New York very much as upon paper collars—causing both to wilt. It is true that the past week has been rather coolish for this stage of the season, but our adipose readers should not deceive themselves with the belief that the mercury will long continue in this depressed mood. We are rather inclined to believe the mercury has something of the feline element in its nature, and is only crouching low in the thermometer as preliminary to a tremendous leap.

This calls to mind the bronzed heroes who have so long braved the fierce rays of a Southern sun, and who are now thronging our streets, enjoying the attractions of the city, and being fleeced by the whole fraternity of swindlers. It is a shame—a burning shame at this season—that these brave fellows who have just received their hard-earned money from the government, should be so outrageously victimised by city sharpers. The thieves, gamblers and rogues, of every degree, seem to devote their entire attention to disbanded soldiers and not a day passes in which cases of soldier-robbing do not occur. One of these victimised heroes—a western man—remarked in our hearing a few days ago that "the rebel capital might have been taken much more easily than it was." How so?" asked a bystander. "If the government," continued the soldier, "had sent a delegation of New York rascals there they would have swindled the rebels out of it."

Speaking of the soldiers reminds us that the conscription bureau—an institution that was organised to aid modest patriots in their military aspirations—has passed away. Its death-knell was sounded on Thursday by an auctioneer who held up the draft-wheels to an appreciative public, and stated that they were "going—going—gone!" Barnum bought one as an addition to his collection of curiosities. It would be a good idea for Barnum to put the draft-wheel in the enclosure with the "learned seal," and let that amphibious prodigy turn it instead of the hand-organ with which it now delights and amazes the curious. But then it might frighten the "able-bodied of the first-class," who are of nervous temperament—we had not thought of that.

Gossip is about equally divided between the unhealthful condition of the streets and the arrest of John Mitchel. This shows that the public are averse to pestiferous influences of whatever character. Mitchel has been transported to Fortress Monroe, and the quidnuncs are in a quandary to know why he was taken so far away, when good accommodations are available in Fort Lafayette. The only plausible solution of this query is, that Government has adopted this mode of punishing Jeff Davis, giving him Mitchel for company. Our humanitarian friends in England may, however, protest against this scurvy treatment of Jeff.

Although we have alluded to Barnum's in connection with the draft wheels, we must not forget to say that Miss Melville continues to attract crowds thither, and the public admiration of the Boone family has in no wise diminished.

The Broadway Theatre has changed proprietors for the season, Mr. Sam Colville having assumed the summer management. Mr. Colville has had the good fortune to secure the services of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Watkins, who are announced to play a limited engagement. They made their first appearance on Monday evening, June 12th, in a new comedy, with the romantic title of the "Peasant Peeress." Mr. and Mrs. Watkins are so well known to the habitués of metropolitan theatres (the latter in former times as Mrs. Charles Howard), that the mere mention of the fact of their presence at the Broadway, should be sufficient to attract nightly a houseful of their admirers.

Miss Bosmer continues her engagement at the Winter Garden, and Miss Maggie Mitchell is still at Niblo's. Those who do not frequent theatres and music halls, and prefer healthy out-door pleasures, turn their faces to Central Park, where they are always welcomed with puffs of fresh country-like breezes, and the odor of all the flowers of the season.

NEW BOOKS, MUSIC, &c.

ATLANTIC MONTHLY, for July. Boston: Ticknor & Fields.

This is an average number of this, the first of American monthlies. The names of Bayard Taylor, John G. Whittier, Mrs. Stowe, are sufficient guarantees of its excellence. The simply told story of "Ellen," by the author of "Life in the Iron Mills," brings tears to our eyes as we read. We wonder if it is true. Bayard Taylor contributes "Winter Life in St. Petersburg," and the genial Ike Marvel, Donald G. Mitchell—the continuation of "Doctor Johns."

"OUR YOUNG FOLKS," for July. Boston: Ticknor & Fields.

It is quite delightful to think that our little folks have at last found some one to take pity on them and write capital articles of all descriptions for their exclusive perusal. In the present number we see the name of Maria L. Child—dear to all our hearts. John G. Whittier comes forward with the "Fish" he "did not catch," and Mrs. Stowe discourses pleasantly on "Dogs." Mayne Reid gives us "Afloat in the Forest," and Carleton "Winning his Way." We have long needed a magazine like this, in America, and we are glad to see that it is welcomed warmly in thousands of homes.

FREDERICK BRADY has just published Mrs. Gore's new novel, "Mothers and Daughters." It contains some of the most delightful pictures of female character that have been drawn by the pen of that clever authoress. The London Spectator pronounces the book a chef d'œuvre.

THE MATCHMAKER. By BEATRICE REYNOLDS, author of "Charles Anchester," "Counterparts," &c. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers.

SILENT STRUGGLES. By MRS. STEPHENS. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers.

These novels are published by Peterson in his usual excellent style, and have had a large sale.

There is always a power and a keen insight into character in the novels of the author of "Fashion and Famine," and the one before us is in Mrs. Stephens' best style. Like all first-rate writers, every novel gives her a greater artistic finish, and does not diminish her freshness as is the case with those young and crude dabblers in ink who gush themselves out in their early efforts. We advise all who wish to take some pleasant reading into the country this warm weather to send for "Silent Struggles" and "The Matchmaker."

THE LIFE, SPEECHES AND SERVICES OF ANDREW JOHNSON, Seventeenth President of the United States, with a Portrait of President Andrew Johnson. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers.

This is a very timely publication, and cannot fail to set at rest many of the absurd stories floating about respecting a president whose conduct hitherto has endeared him to every loyal citizen.

PERSONS about leaving town, either in the pursuit of pleasure or in the more serious interests of business, will be gratified to learn that Messrs. Benedict Brothers, of 171 Broadway, have issued cards containing the time-tables of all the railways centering in the metropolis.

TRUMP'S AMERICA HOYLE, OR GENTLEMEN'S HAND-BOOK OF GAMES.

Like so many of Dick & Fitzgerald's publications, this is a complete multum in parvo of the subject, and we can cordially recommend this American Hoyle as the best of the kind published.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—President Johnson has issued a proclamation still further opening the South to commerce, recognizing that armed rebellion has ceased in Tennessee, and annulling previous disqualifying proclamations, which applied only to an insurrectionary state.

—— The new treaty between the United States and Honduras provides for perpetual amity and a reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation. The right of way of the contemplated Honduras inter-oceanic railway is also secured to us.

—— The 33d Massachusetts regiment, which bore so honorable a part in Sherman's grand raiding expedition through Georgia and the Carolinas, met with an enthusiastic reception on their arrival in Boston on Wednesday, the 13th ult.

—— A serious railway accident occurred about a mile and a half this side of Washington, on the evening of the 13th ult. Five or six persons were killed, and between 30 and 40 wounded, many of them fatally. Careless conductor said to have been the cause.

—— A terrible explosion took place at Chattanooga on Saturday, the 10th ult. Several persons were killed and wounded. The Quartermaster's and Commissary's buildings also caught fire and were consumed. The conflagration is supposed to have been caused by dishonest officials to hide defective accounts. Loss $250,000.

—— On Tuesday, the 13th of June, the sentence of death was passed on Michael Kenny, in the Brooklyn Court of Oyer and Terminer, for the murder in that city of John Ravensburg, on the 19th of April, 1863.

—— Preparations are making at San Francisco for the grandest celebration of the 4th of July ever known on the Pacific coast.

—— The Secretary of War has ordered the release of all the prisoners of war in Fort McHenry, including those sentenced during the war.

—— The Indians recently attacked a Mormon train at North Platte crossing and Eagle Creek station, on the overland route, killing and wounding all the stock-tenders and soldiers. Gen. Conner has sent troops to keep the mail route open.

—— The persons charged with an attempt to seize the steamer Colon, have been held to answer before the County Court in San Francisco, on the charge of grand larceny. The evidence does not clearly show what was the purpose of the intended seizure.

—— Great distress is reported to prevail among the people of North Carolina, owing to the scarcity of food.

—— Large numbers of soldiers are deserting from their regiments at Washington, and going home on the ground that they enlisted "for the war," and that the war is now ended.

—— A band of guerillas, numbering 500, have lately collected in Patrick county, Virginia, threatening the people with vengeance. Four of them have been arrested and tried by the military justices of the peace, and two of them sentenced to be hung or shot, and the others sent to the penitentiary.

—— Gen. Halleck, in a letter dated Military Division of the James, Richmond, June 7, replies in detail to the statements of Gen. Sherman, made in the latter's letters dated May 9 and May 26, with other papers on the same subject. These statements and reflections Gen. Halleck pronounces incorrect and entirely unjustified by the facts in the case. Gen. Halleck makes nine points of reply to the charges of Gen. Sherman, his strongest ones being those in which he states that he acted directly under the orders of the Lieut.-General, and closes his letter by saying, that Gen. Sherman's report is "unjust, unkind, and contrary to military usage, and that his statements are contrary to the real facts of the case."

—— Gens. Ed. Johnson and P. T. Moore, A. O. P. Nicholson, Arnold, the Mayor of Savannah, Gen. J. R. Anderson, of the Tredegar Iron Works, and many other leading rebels are applicants for pardon under the Amnesty proclamation.

—— It is said that Ford's theatre—the scene of President Lincoln's assassination—has been purchased by a society of Congregationalists, and will speedily be converted into a house of worship.

—— It was estimated by the Quartermaster-General in his last annual report, that there were in the service of the army about 170,000 horses and 130,000 mules. The supply of cavalry horses averaged about 500 a day which was also the measure of the destruction of these animals in service. During the first eight months of the year 1864, the cavalry of the Potomac received nearly 40,000 horses, and there was issued to the army of Gen. Sherman through the Nashville depot, between the 1st of November, 1863, and the 14th of September, 1864, 41,122 horses.

—— In response to a query about his speaking at the Cooper Institute, Gen. Grant said: "I made up my mind about that many years ago. I never have spoken and I am too old to begin; not that I feel so very old, either; but I can't speak, and I certainly shall not dictate anything for any one else to say for me."

—— David Goodrich, of Williamstown, recently set 70 eggs under two Brahma Pootra hens, and the same successfully hatched out 71 live chickens. These biddies must have worn crinoline of very broad dimensions to cover so many eggs.

—— Two gentlemen of this city, Messrs. Trevor and Colgate, have recently given to Madison University the sum of $60,000, one-half of which amount is to be applied to the endowment of 20 permanent and free scholarships for the benefit of young soldiers.

—— During the past ten days no less than 106,505 troops have been furnished with transportation and left Washington.

—— Attorney-General Speed has issued a circular to the effect that applicants for pardon under the "special" clause in the Amnesty proclamation, must first take the oath and transmit the original with the application.

—— A conference took place in Richmond on the 16th of June between Governor Pierpoint and the members of the Virginia Legislature, the subject under consideration being a proposition to extend the right of suffrage beyond the limits imposed by the Alexandria constitution, by which all who have taken part in the rebellion are excluded from the privilege of voting. If Virginia is not represented in the next session of Congress, it will not be because Virginians willing to fill seats in that body cannot be found. Candidates for these positions are coming to light rapidly, including some gentlemen who, a short time ago, would have considered themselves insulted by being called citizens of the United States. It is even said that the late rebel Governor, Extra Billy Smith, proposes to run for election, if he can first get President Johnson to pardon him.

—— Governor Brownlow, of Tennessee, has issued a proclamation, ordering the election, on the first Thursday of August (the 3d) next, of a full delegation to Congress and members of the Legislature in certain districts in which there are vacancies.

—— Orders have been issued for the dismantling of all the defensive works around Washington, excepting twenty-two forts and three or four batteries, so located as to form a complete defence to the capital on all sides. These, it is said, will be strengthened and improved, and permanently garrisoned.

—— Another terrible fire occurred in Saratoga, on Sunday, June 18, when, about four in the afternoon, the United States Hotel caught fire near the centre of the the building. So rapid was the progress of the flames that in less than three hours all was nearly consumed. The Marvin House was also destroyed, as well as three Club Houses, the Telegraph, Express Offices, &c. It is supposed to be the work of incendiaries.

—— It is said in Washington that both Alexander H. Stephens, the ex-rebel vice-president, and R. E. Lee, ex-rebel commander, are penitent applicants to President Johnson for pardon.

—— Gen. Alfred H. Terry has recently, by direction of the War Department, assumed command of the Department of Virginia, with headquarters at Richmond.

—— Mrs. Lincoln has taken up her residence for the summer at Hyde Park, six miles out of Chicago.

Personal.—Major Gen. Ord has been appointed to the military command of the State of Oregon.

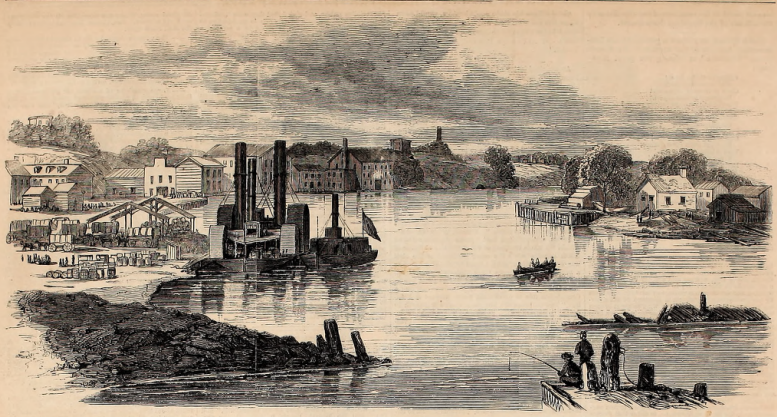
—— Judah P. Benjamin, and John C. Breckinridge, late of the rebel cabinet, have thrown up their portfolios. The former has turned up in Bermuda; the latter is resting from his flight in Cuba.

—— Mark Lamon, who has been for so many years U. S. Marshal, has resigned his position. One of Mr. Forney's editors has received the appointment.

—— M. F. Maury, quondam rebel commander in the rebel navy, recently addressed a letter to Admiral Gordon, U. S. N., while the latter was stationed at Havana, offering to surrender himself to the U. S. authorities on the same terms as those granted to Gen. Lee.

—— Hon. Schuyler Colfax, and party, arrived at Salt Lake City, on the 11th inst. On the following evening he addressed a large concourse of people, predicting a brilliant future for Utah.

—— Hon. William L. Sharkey, has been appointed Provisional Governor of Mississippi.



—— Ex-President Buchanan is about to publish a history of his administration, prepared by himself.

—— John Mitchell was arrested at the Daily News office in this city on the afternoon of June 14. He was at once taken on board a government steamer, which sailed immediately for Fortress Monroe.

—— Clarence A. Seward, of this city has been appointed Acting Assistant Secretary of State, in consequence of the continued illness of Frederick W. Seward.

—— The late Tyler Bigelow, Esq., of Watertown, New York, by his last will, left the sum of $10,000 to Harvard College, as a fund for the maintenance and support of indigent and meritorious students.

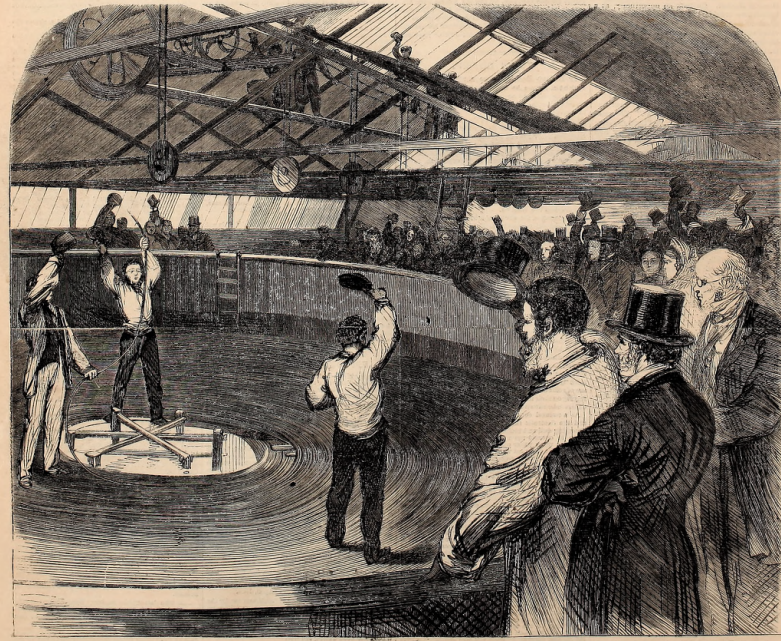
—— Mr. Joseph Lawrence, long known as the President of the United States Trust Company, died at his residence, in this city, on Sunday evening, the 11th of June,

THE STEAMBOAT LANDING OF THE CONFEDERATE NAVY YARD, RICHMOND, VA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

SCENE IN THE FIVE POINTS, N. Y.

Funeral from a Tenement House.

OUR present number contains a correct picture of one of these monumoth enormities called tenement houses. In that our readers can see the every-day living death of the poor. Let our wealthier citizens ponder over that picture, and see in it the great fever manufactory, whose shafts reach their marble palaces, and strike down their fairest and dearest treasures. Let them also see in it the school of burglars and courtezans, whose bludgeons and blandishments destroy them and their sons.



On our first page we give the last scene of all, the funeral of one of the wretched inmates of these pestilential dwellings—most certainly to this class the grim visitor must come as a releasing angel, to unlock the den of misery.

An English writer, in some powerful verses on this very subject, says, in a sort of refrain to his poem:

Rattle his bones
Over the stones,
It is only a pauper that nobody owns.

The picture is a sad one, and we hope all who see it will do what they can to amend the condition of the poor, if only from the selfish consideration that they are heightening the life of those they love, and also adding to the security of their own property.

WATCHES are often stolen. Every watch should be kept upon its guard.

BEFORE THE BATTLE.

BY EBEN E. REXFORD.

COMRADES, see the foe before us,
See their standard flout the air,
See the banner waving o'er us,
We must plant our banner there.

Death is near;
Comrades, soldiers, never fear;
I may die, and you may fall,
We may heed an angel's call,
But the day must first be won
If we'd call our mission done;
We must crush the traitors low,
Ere across the lake we go.
God will spare us strength and life
Till we win, to-day, the strife.
Soldiers all,
If amid the fray we fall,
With our face toward the foe,
Nobler death we cannot know.
Freedom's cause is that of Right,
Right is Truth, and Truth is Might.
If we give our life, our all,
And we win the funeral pall,
Who can know that evermore—
Evermore—
On the grand, great roll of Fame
Shall be writ each soldier's name
Who in Freedom's battle died,
Grand, and great, and glorified.
Comrades all,
If it be my lot to fall,
Let my humble grave be made
Where I fell; I'd there be laid
In the soldier's resting-place,
With the sods above my face.
If I fall in Freedom's fray,
Tell the loved ones, far away,
That I did my duty well,
And for Right and Freedom fell.
That is all.

Hark, I hear the bugles' call!
Forward, boys, into the fight,
Strike for God and strike for Right,
Strike till victory is won,
Or the life God gave is done.

A TIMELY DISCOVERY.

How it was Made and the Result.

BY W. JARED HALL

CHAPTER I.—AN OLD WOMAN ASKING FOR ALMS.

GENERAL ZACHARY TAYLOR, with his victorious army, crossed the Rio Grande on the morning of May 18th, 1846, and took formal possession of Matamorse, Arista, the Mexican commander, having fallen back to Monterey. The Rio Grande, at this time, was the theatre of momentous military events. Every ear was turned thitherwards for the latest intelligence; every other interest was absorbed in the eager desire for information from the armies.

Santa Anna was putting forth every exertion to stay the progress of the invaders, who, like a mighty avalanche, rolled on and on despite every opposition. The country was as a place with a blighting scourge by the Mexican hordes. Every man capable of bearing arms was drawn into their ranks; every hearth was made desolate, and thousands of hearts were bereaved.

Notwithstanding all this, there were in the same locality, and at the same time, incidents and interests peculiar to individuals, outside the terrible scenes of war, which were of vital importance, and which marked an epoch in their lives as strongly as great victories did in that of the nation.

On the south bank of the Rio Grande, nearly a league above Matamoras, yet within the Federal lines, stood an old Spanish villa—the only residence of any importance in the vicinity. The proprietor, entirely at variance with the people among whom he lived, had expended large sums of money in arranging and beautifying his estate. The villa was in the centre of a park, perhaps five acres in extent, over which were gracefully disposed, trees, shrubs, bowers and ornaments.

Winding paths and carriage-ways of fine white gravel extended through the grounds. Fountains with jets sparkling in the sunlight could be seen at intervals. Artificial lakes with floating islands, crowned with rare tropical flowers, were interspersed amid the scene. The fish sported in the crystal water, and birds sang from every bush. This highly embellished homestead remained untouched in the midst of the bloody carnage that deluged the land.

Don Sebastian and his aged wife had lived there upwards of fifty years, and were loved and esteemed. They had no children, but there was living with them a young lady, sixteen years of age, whom they had adopted.

Arista, when at Matamoras, issued an order prohibiting trespass on this estate. It is not improbable that the dark-eyed Eloise, the adopted daughter, whose good will the Mexican general had endeavored to secure, had much to do with the promulgation of this edict. General Taylor, on taking command, ordered that all private property within his lines should be unmolested. Thus we find it on the afternoon of August 15th, 1846.

VERANDO AND ELOISE.

The sun was sinking in the west, a cool breeze played among the foliage, the atmosphere was fragrant with the odors of myriad blossoms, and Eloise sat beneath the shade of a tree in the great park. She had been forming a bouquet of rich and rare flowers, but it lay on the grass before her. Her hands were clasped together, her gaze was fixed on the ground, and she was thinking—thinking of her mother whom she had never seen. As she sat there, sad and thoughtful, the past came up before her like a great moving panorama, and there was but one blemish on it—that was the uncertainty of her birth. Since her earliest recollection she had been the darling pet of two as true and loving hearts as ever beat—Don Sebastian and his wife. They had bestowed on her every gift, every pleasure, every wish. She had asked for nothing that they had not granted cheerfully. She loved them as she would have loved her own parents. Their precepts and examples had grown and ripened in her character, until she was a young lady of moral excellence unsurpassed. Yet despite all these advantages and happy surroundings, there were times when she longed to see her true parents. Who were they, or where was she to look for them? The old Don had told her, time and again, all that he knew of them. It was this: sixteen years before, a man and woman with an infant, disembarked from a New York and Panama steamer that came into the port of Matamoras in a gale. The following morning, the storm having subsided, the steamer again put to sea. The strangers had taken rooms at a hotel, and it was not known whether they had designed to remain in the city or to continue on in the steamer. They had, unfortunately, neglected to register their names. About ten o'clock in the forenoon, the infant was found alone and heavily drugged in the room they had occupied. There were marks of blood on the bed clothes, a large spot on the floor, and the door-latch was hammered with the same weapon. These facts were all known, much excitement was created, but no definite information obtained. The child was placed in the hands of a physician, who restored it from the effects of the drug, when it was offered to any responsible family desirous of adopting it. Don Sebastian took the babe home with him, made out the necessary papers, and assumed the responsibility of its guardianship. The child was beautiful, and those dark, gory spots may have been the blood-red of her parents. It was said that made her sad and shy, but the flowers which she had been arranging.

ELOISE AND THE STRANGE WOMAN.

Dona had gathered in her eyes, and the mantilla around her mouth worked nervously, as the sound of a footstep fell on her ear. She looked up and discovered in the room, wrapped in a heavy cloak hood, and leaning on a cane, standing before her.

"Pardon me, miss, for this intrusion," said she, "if I was in search of Don Sebastian's residence, and took the nearest route across the country from Matamoras. Is his dwelling near?"

Elcie's face grew very dy in an instant. Her emotions were aroused, and she stood before the strange woman, whose pallid frame shook until she could scarcely speak.

"Be seated, good lady," Elcise said, taking hold of her arm.

"You are tired and trouble, ...ay you come far?"

"From the city," she answered. "It is far to the Don's house, I fear? If so, I shall not be able to reach it. My limbs almost refuse to carry me."

"You are on the Don's estate now," Elcise replied. "It is but a little way to the house. Sit down and rest a moment, then I will go with you."

"On the Don's estate now!" reiterated the woman, with a gasp, leaning heavily on her cane, but a figure entered, with a commanding air, and her eyes fixed steadily on Elcise. "On the Don's estate, you say, miss, is well?"

"I am," Elcise answered, wondering at the singular exhibition of feeling.

"God strengthen me now!" the woman ejaculated fervently, and reached out a hand.

It was quickly withdrawn, and a sudden calmness came over her. For an instant she did not breathe. Her eyes were like balls of fire, and fixed in a steady gaze on a man approaching. The blood rushed to her face, her lips were compressed as with a spasm of pain, and her hands grasped the cane till the ends of her fingers were purple.

Elcise looked at her in mute astonishment. She saw how the figure, she heard words issue from between them that seemed to come from a heart all crushed and bleeding.

"Recall me not a word to that man of what I have said to you. If he asks who I am, tell him I was a poor woman asking alms. But stay here till he has gone; I would not see you again."

With this she drew her hood close around her face, turned and walked away. She was soon concealed from view behind the shrubbery.

CHAPTER II.—THE OLD WOMAN IN ELOISE'S GROVE.

The man advancing, and whose presence had affected the woman so strangely, was about fifty years of age, and named Don Lorenzo Varango. He was well educated, and his manners were calculated to inspire confidence. He was an agreeable conversationalist, had travelled extensively, and delighted to relate his adventures while pouring the wine for his friends. He was a man who, like Eloise's pure, confiding, trusting one, was not altogether an unpleasant companion. There had been a time, however, during that acquaintance, a period of nearly one year, when her heart was really depressed in his presence. He had given utterance to sentiments in moments of moments that had made her start and tremble. He always seemed to control, and with a cunning peculiarity his own so effaced those impressions from her mind that she was ready to trust him again. Then, as the storm-cloud disappeared, she sank on the grass, and her flowers, and did not look up until he spoke.

"How is it that I have been frightened by the old merchant?" he asked, dropping on the grass beside her. "A fury in the midst of roses!" he added, with a laugh, and gently placed a flower in the braid of her hair.

"I have!" Eloise replied. "She is a poor woman, and I wish I could help her; she seems to be much distressed."

"Which women always are," he answered, lightly. "I have seen thousands in Italy and France who would draw tears from a marble statue by their lamentations, and laugh in their sleeves the moment one's back was turned. But come, let us talk of another matter more interesting; Julian has been to Matamoras to make arrangements for your and his wedding."

"Who gave him such directions?" Eloise asked, with a start.

"The old Don," was the reply. "He said he was willing, if you were, to have the ceremony take place to-morrow."

"But I am not willing."

She spoke calmly, but with decision.

"Why not?" he urged. "Everything is ready."

"No, I am not ready," and taking the flower from her hair she began pulling it to pieces.

"You are a strange girl," he added, with more show of feeling than was advisable.

"Perhaps so," she said, coolly. "I am in no hurry to be married. I have too good a home here to desire a change. Julian was very anxious this morning that I should say 'yes' to every one of his propositions; yet not one of them pleased me or had my assent. It is only about six months since we first met. You brought him to me, and we have him only to pour out upon. Julian Lorette. My guardian is old and childish; he is easily persuaded, and always evasive and to please me. His peculiarities cannot simply because he thought I desired it. Indeed, I do not. If I was undecided this morning, I am now more so than ever. Julian, I fear, has not a very much impolite or improprietous and illutined."

"Will you not reconsider this decision?" he asked, after a short pause.

"There is nothing to reconsider," she replied. "I have made no promises yet, it is quite than probable, had not the movement of Julian and Julian's to-day occurred, I should have pledged my heart and hand to him before many weeks. Now I view my situation in a different light; I think I see something in this haste and urgency that is not genuine."

"You are pleased to be somewhat over suspicious," he remarked, coolly.

"You can consider it very polite," she answered. "For the present I desire to be alone."

"You are tired, I should say, more than he intended, and was surprised to find her mistress of a spirit and firmness that he had thought her incapable of exhibiting. Rising to his feet, he said:

"I will return to the house, and, if Julian is there, will send him to plead his own suit."

"Pardon me once more," she replied, and do not wish to be disturbed," was the sharp rejoinder.

"As it pleases you," and he was soon out of sight.

For a few moments after Varango left, Eloise sat as one stunned. Her eyes were fixed on the spot of the past few months, with a whirl that startled her. Every incident of that period came up fresh in her memory. She remembered well the day Varango came to the villa, his ostensible errand, seeking her friends, and yet she had never heard him make any mention of them since. She expected to receive the good will of her guardian, and had done so, but Varango, in his cautious examination of her connection with these men, who had always been kind and generous, alone, I will unburden my heart."

Eloise hesitated, not from fear or doubt; she was thinking. The woman added:

"I am a poor old woman, honest before heaven. I have no fear of men. When I have spoken to you as I would, you will have no cause to complain."

"That was not what made me silent," Eloise replied. "My mind is straying in directions. Come, I will lead you to the house. We will pass around and enter at the back door."

Time is precious, and I will briefly the arm to steady her. A short walk brought them to the building, when they entered, closing and bolting the door. Varango and Lorette, at this time, were in the family sitting-room in consultation with the old Don.

"I have nothing more to say in connection with this matter," remarked the old Don, as in connclusion of a conversation that we will not relate. It would grieve us sorely if she were to leave us, yet I would not lay a straw in the way of her happiness."

"She need not leave you," interrupted Julian. "She can remain if it is desirable."

"Most certainly!" interjected Varango. "It is not necessary that she should leave you, simply because she is married. I am only anxious to have this matter settled before I leave for Europe, and I must go next week. My interests there have been so long neglected that I shall be the loser by a large amount. My own affairs and my estates in Italy are sadly in need of my presence. I trust you will excuse my haste, and that it is only modestly shyness that makes her hesitate. The ceremony once performed, everything will go to your and her satisfaction."

"I do not doubt you gentlemen; but as I said before, her will must be considered."

"I have no doubt it will be in my favor," remarked Julian. "For the present we will drop the subject, but this evening at ten, Eloise being present, we will arrange the final settlement."

"That is satisfactory to me," replied the Don, and the two gentlemen arose to depart. They passed out into the park, and arm in arm, walked along a carriage-way, engaged in earnest conversation.

They had not been gone ten minutes when Eloise came down from her chamber. Her garments sat in his favorite seat by a window, while his wife lay asleep in an adjoining apartment. There was a glow on Eloise's cheek, and her eye sparkled with unusual brilliancy. The old Don did not observe it, however—he was wrapped in meditation. She approached him quickly, laid an arm around his neck, kissed him and whispered in his ear. He started, gazed inquiringly into her face, then followed her silently from the room. An hour later the Don's carriage—a closely covered vehicle—left the rear entrance, with a black servant, carrying away Eloise and the strange woman. It was evident something of importance had occurred. In the carriage the latter was seated forward at a rapid pace, and their course lay toward Matamoras.

CHAPTER III.—DISCOVERY AND A HUSBAND.

The sun rose oddest at night. Varango and Lorette, with the Don's wife, sat in the family sitting-room. Old Sebastian seemed to have received a shock in which the past few hours. He was happy, and did not seek to conceal his enjoyment. His wife, possessing a less demonstrative nature, was also happy, though she could not keep pale the face of her husband, and from him to the two men, who, ignorant of any cause for the manifestation of gratification, looked it to be the result of Eloise that the marriage should take place.

They were elated with expectations all their own.

Half past ten, yet Eloise had not come into the room. Varango ventured an inquiry.

"I will see if she is prepared," and the Don rang a silver bell. A servant appeared, to whom he said:

"Go see if Eloise is in her chamber. If she is, ask her to come down to the sitting-room."

The servant left the room, and after the door re-opened, when Eloise, leaning on the arm of a young man, a cloak over his shoulders, entered the apartment.

The presence of the stranger gave the two men a momentary start, but they affected unconcern, and awaited Eloise's explanation. No movement was made to gratify them in this respect. Eloise, with a little, saucy air, led the young man sat down by Madam Sebastian. She old lady laid aside her knitting, and entered familiarly into conversation.

Eloise talked and chatted gaily with Varango, Lorette and her guardian, when Varango made a considered remark in reference to admitting a stranger when they had selected the time to settle an important question.

"That is the second question to settle with either of you, gentlemen," she replied, coloring. "This young officer is authorized to transact the business matter this evening."

"I am sorry, gentlemen," observed the individual alluded to, rising and laying aside his cloak, "extremely sorry to disappoint either of you in the scheme you had in contemplation; but as a commissioned officer I hold an order from the commanding-general for your arrest. Will you submit peaceably, or shall I call a guard?"

Five minutes elapsed, gave an entire new aspect to affairs, and a short time more secured. Varango was the first to speak. His words fairly hissed as they came from his lips.

"I see how matters stand without further explanation. We have simply failed, and are powerless to struggle against it. We will be ready for the present, and bide our time. It will come! I will say, however, that it was not the want we need fear. Eloise, I will be certain to settle that at our leisure some future day. Draw your weapons Lorette, and we will cut our way out."

Just then a door opened, and the strange woman, leaning on her cane, stood, an elderly man, came into the room. It was Don Sebastian's brother, a prominent citizen of Matamoras. Eloise had gone to him for protection, and he was present as the authority he applied to General Taylor, who had sent a lieutenant and guard.

"I see you have arrested a lieutenant?" he acted, addressing the young officer.

"Yes; it is as you ordered," was the prompt reply.

"Very well—we will proceed without delay. The lady," placing her a seat, "will give us her testimony."

Her eyes were upon Varango since she entered the room, and, as he moved beneath her scrutiny, Eloise came nearer the lieutenant. The Don and his wife witnessed the scene with wonder.

Whether Eloise had overheard what the woman would say, or waiting for an opportunity to escape, the prisoners remained passive, even exhibited a calm indifference. The woman spoke:

"Seventeen years ago, in company with my husband, we were on our return from Brazil to the United States. We had been quite a long number of years, and had accumulated a handsome property. Being well pleased with the country or government, we decided to turn our possessions into money, and return to New Orleans—or native land. We entered this design, so far as carrying it homeward. We took a steamer at Rio Janeiro for Panama, at which place we arrived safely. Here we stopped a few days at a New York packet, and continued our journey. The day following our embarkation at Panama, my husband discovered a suspicious-looking man stealthily watching him. This gave us much uneasiness, and to add to our fears, the man left the ship. Eloise birth to a daughter. Shortly after this event, we came on a fearful storm. It lasted for several days, and it was feared the ship, with all on board, would be lost. Still, in the midst of these terrible scenes, that strange man hung about us. We decided that he was a robber, who had some way learned of our money, and only waited an opportunity to secure it. The storm finally drove us into the port of Matamoras. Here, quickly, and as we thought unobserved, we went ashore. Our first movement was to secure rooms at a hotel, intending to let the packet pass on, and go ourselves by the next steamer.

"The first night at the hotel, that same man, with another whom I had not before seen, entered our room and struck my husband a blow that made him senseless. I sprang out of bed, when a liquid from a vial was forced into my mouth, and immediately I was helpless—unconscious. When my reason returned, my husband and I were in a sailing vessel, and out at sea. My child was not with us. I was told it was dead, but I never fully believed it. My husband was alive, but it was evident he could not live. His skull was badly fractured, and he did not know me. During the day he was thrown overboard before my eyes. The men said me that they had been hired to throw both of us into the sea, but if I would behave myself and seek for them, my life should be spared. I do not know how I lived, or what happened during the days that followed. All that I remembered of that terrible pastis that I was landed at night, surrounded in a lunatic asylum in Mexico, Sicily. I now think that for a period I was actually crazy, but when I recovered the past all came back to me. My husband and my child, all—all were remembered. Oh, God! how I suffered! I could not tell how long I had been there. I was not kept badly treated, but allowed no privilege whatever. I begged for pen and paper that I might write to my friends and apprise them of my situation, but this was refused. Shortly after by a party of Americans visited. I saw them, heard them speak, and oh, how my heart leaped for joy! They believed my story: I was released and furnished with money to return to my native country. Recently, that my husband was dead, yet hoping that my child had been saved, I came directly to New Orleans and from there to Matamoras. Here, a little, inquiry I learned that my daughter was living, and where she could be seen. I came here, but not a day too soon. The same man—that villain—was standing between me and my child!"

The woman, pointing to Varango, spoke. "not content with the destruction of the property which has been plotting against the child. Yes, it was he that entered our room that fatal night, and struck the fearful blow. I know him; a fiend never forgets a face."

She ceased speaking, and her eye wandered to Eloise. Then reaching out both arms the two women locked in a fervent embrace.

"My child! My darling child!" the mother moaned.

"Yes, mother! Dear, dear mother!" She sobbed a moment, then added: "I have been so happy here all the days of my life, while you have been in misery. Can we ever unmerable? but we both will be happy now and hereafter."

"Do you have heard the evidence," remarked the lieutenant, addressing the culprits. "You can consider yourselves under arrest."

"Who are you," asked Varango with a sneer, "that you have so great an interest in the affairs belonging to others?"

"I am simply a lieutenant obeying the command of my superior officer."

The sentence was scarcely spoken when there was a flash, a report, and a ball whizzed past the lieutenant's head, lodging in the wall. Then, unintentionally, a preconcerted signal was given, and a volley leading into the apartment was thrown open and each presented a goodly array of loaded muskets.

"Dash through the window," shouted Varango, "it's our only chance."

It was the last sentence he ever uttered. He had hardly done speak, and raised himself upon the window-sill, when he dropped back into the room, pierced by a bullet from the lieutenant's pistol. Lorette attempted to escape through the same opening, but fell back across the body of his late companion. Both were dead. Vengeance had been swift.

"Remove the bodies from the room and bury them," commanded the lieutenant, "then return to your quarters."

The soldiers obeyed with alacrity, and quiet was soon restored.

Then followed a scene of congratulation to her who had suffered so much, and who had at last reached a haven of rest. It was evident she would not be able to enjoy it for some days, for the fullness of his heart, declared that she should never leave them, and that if kindness and love could do anything for the dear child, she would be happy again. Eloise cried and laughed alternately.

"Why should I not be happy?" she said. "I have now two mothers—two dear, dear mothers."

Sebastian's brother and the lieutenant, did not leave the house until the next morning, when they returned to Matamoras. From that time on, for several months, the lieutenant was an almost daily visitor. Eloise was not disinclined to his preference, and grew to watch his coming—even to look at it as a duty. Then came an attachment one formed, and at the time the Federal army moved on Monterey, they were openly engaged.

Their marriage, however, did not take place until after the war, when the lieutenant resigned his commission and settled down in the villa, the hopes of years.

In the fulness of time, Eloise's mother was taken from them, and soon afterwards the Don and his wife followed. Eloise and her husband were then sole possessors of the Sebastian estate, and after many misgivings they decided to dispose of it, and remove to the North.

They came and selected a pleasant home on the banks of the Ohio, where they were happy and contented when the first gun was fired on Sumter. This roused the martial spirit of the commander, and off to the front he and Brady, and girding on the armor he went forth again to fight the battles for the Union. On his sword-blade to-day is the simple inscription, "For Eloise and my country!"

The following is the world-renowned epitaph of the Irish Elizabeth O'Conner:

"First county to Burke, commonly called the Sultan, she was kind, passionate and de-ep religious. Also she painted in water-colors, and sent many pictures to the great exhibition, and of which is the kingdom of heaven."

LIFE OR DEATH FOR TRAITORS?

Arnold.

BY H. OAKES SMITH.

TRAITORS! hand by heavy judgment saved
The human race from human due to cancel
Compound to see big lochs grow white with thine,
And thy unhonored head, that might have craved
A little pity, for its blossoms laved
And frosted over with their wintry rime,
Weighed with the patriotic curse of every clime;
Unmitigated execration graved
Upon big name unto all coming years.
Had death thus claimed, our human hearts had known
A human pang to hold redeem thy name.
The stoic virtue of thy stern composure
Had with a less resplendent lustre shone;
But then, condemned to live, was doomed to deeper shame.

GUY'S FOLLY;

CHAPTER XIV.—THE NEW ARRIVAL.

WHEN Guy Raymond reached Raymond Park it was ten o'clock, and he found, to his surprise, that the old servant was waiting at the gate for him.

John Grover, indeed, seemed eagerly awaiting him.

"What ails you, John?" cried Guy, who had left the hired carriage at the end of the lane. "Have you seen a ghost?"

"No; I think of the two, I'd rather have seen a ghost, sir," he answered; for he could not have uttered as much, and forced me to bring him a supper?

Guy laughed.

"Why, Grover, you're cheerful!"

"Some rough fellow, with a hoarse yard bow, who came up swaggering, with a great stick in his hand!"

"Is Guy Raymond here?" he asked, in an unpolished manner.

"No sir," I said.

"Then I'll come in and wait."

"I objected, saying that we never allowed strangers to stay in the house while you were absent.

"But there was no getting rid of him. He looked so fiercely at me, that I was obliged to give up my duties as watchman; and I was just thinking of making a virtue of necessity, and asking him to enter, when he thrust himself past me, and entered the house.

"He went into the dining-room, flung himself into an arm chair, and ringing the bell furiously, soon brought me with some trepidation into the room. He then ordered me at once to bring up supper, which I did; and there he is now."

"And you have come out here to deliver with cold and fear, while he robs me, perhaps, of half my money and plate?"

John Grover chuckled knowingly.

"No, no, sir; I am not such a fool as that!" he said. "I crept into the two doors, and, unless he gets out of the window over there, or picks the locks, he can't escape. He's had no time for this yet."

"And did he give no name?" asked Guy, as they stood on the broad steps.

"Only this: 'I'll say Freshfield.'"

"I thought as much," he said, as, stepping in, he unlocked the dining-room, and entered.

The man made no effort, or rather felling back in his chair, with his feet on the mantlepiece, and he glanced round, quite leisurely and coolly, as Guy Raymond entered.

He was a man of about forty-five years of age, apparently of a brisk, wiry nature, with an amount of hair, and beard, and moustache, and a strong look of determination on his bronzed countenance.

His head was covered with an old wide awake hat, his legs were encased in leathern knickerbockers, and his clothes altogether were rough, and with a view rather to comfort and strength than to ornament.

Guy Raymond, smothering the rage he felt at the man's insolence, walked across the room and drew a chair up to him, and called John Grover.

"Prepare some brandy!" he said.

John Grover brought it, poured out a glass, handed it to his master to drink, and he drank accordingly.

And all this time the stranger kept his eye fixed on Guy Raymond, and never spoke a word.

When John Grover had quitted the room, Guy spoke.

"Who is my guest—and what does he want?"

The stranger laughed, removed his hat, and eyed Raymond with an amused and insolent air.

"Do you pretend not to know me?"

"I do not know you."

"You mean me to believe that you do not remember me?"

"I only remember those in whom, at one period of my life I was a brother, I have taken interest; those persons are few, and among those few you are not reckoned."

"Well, then, I will remind you. My name is Freshfield."

Guy Raymond nodded.

"I thought it might be," he said.

The man ground his teeth in vexation; he had evidently anticipated that his words would take a far greater effect.

"Well, and as you know my name, you know what I've come for?" he cried, fiercely.

"Not in the slightest."

"You lie, Guy Raymond—lie miserably and foolishly!" cried George Freshfield. "You do know why I am here! I am come for Claudia!"

A slight betrayal of emotion there was, truly, on Guy Raymond's face as Freshfield said those words betraying anger.

The answer he made was given calmly, firmly, collectedly.

"Come for Claudia? If so, why do you come to me?"

"Because she is with you—because you are hiding her away!"

"And if I am, what then?"

"You have no right to hide her."

"Indeed! what right, then, have you?"

"I am her father's brother, the one whom her father trusted to be distributed as her guardian, and I will have her."

"And when you find her, what will you do with her?"

"Do with her. Find her a husband, to be sure."

Raymond smiled.

"And, meanwhile, spend all her money for your own use. Yes, yes, Mr. George Freshfield, I understand your game well. You play for heavy stakes, but I assure you will lose more than you gain."

Freshfield uttered an oath.

"Hark'e my lad! only be civil. I don't ask you to look after my good or bad fortune; I can take care of that myself."

"And what, then, do you want me to do? Why have you come here at all?"

"To ask to see Claudia; to demand from you her delivery to me."

"And if I refuse?"

"Refuse! you will not refuse; she is not here. I cannot help you."

Freshfield withdrew his legs from their graceful position, and leaning roundly fixed Guy Raymond, at the same time bringing his fist down angrily on the table.

"Look here, Guy Raymond," he said—"look here! I'm not the man you take me for. I am no simpleton, and I know well that you have come to stand off my self-love that I have served my time. If you don't deliver up my niece to me within two days from this, I'll have you up for justice after you, as sure as I am a living man."

"And supposing I tell you that Claudia is not your niece, what then?"

"I should say you lied."

"What if I proved it?"

"Ashow me your proofs, and prove it."

"I will do so; only listen to me. When I was a young man, I fell in love—madly in love with a girl named Lucy Grey. She was a governess, I should detain you by a long and detailed account of her country her worth, and her accomplishments; but I will but say that we loved, and resolved to be married. But my father, to whom ever love was a laughing matter, and who looked on the match as a folly, refused his consent, and declared that if I married Lucy Grey, he would disinherit me.

"I was poor in comparison to my father, and could ill afford to lose his wealth; but I was resolved to marry her, and I did so.

"Then he ordered me at once to bring up supper, which I did; and there he is now."

"And you have come out here to shiver with cold and fear, while he robs me, perhaps, of half my money and plate?"

John Grover chuckled knowingly.

"No, no, sir; I am not such a fool as that!" he said. "I crept into the two doors, and, unless he gets out of the window over there, or picks the locks, he can't escape. He's had no time for this yet."

"As to that, you must please yourself," said Guy Raymond, quietly.

He saw him out, and locked the heavy door carefully after him, and returned to his seat by the fire-side.

"Ah," he murmured, as he sank down, and folded his arms; "the will tell her all, and my revenge will be nearly complete."

Before, however, he heard the interview between Freshfield and the stranger-lady, I must follow the footsteps of another character, who takes a very prominent position in my story.

THE GRAND MATCH

Between the Athletic Base Ball Club, of Philadelphia, and the Resolute Club, of Brooklyn.

THE most numerous assemblage yet seen on the Union ground assembled on Thursday, 19th June, when the contest for championship and for equally costly Bookmakers, a meeting which ended in two discomfitures of the latter. It is estimated that there were over 6,000 persons present to witness the match, many of the number coming to-day for sea.

The weather was exceedingly propitious for the game, and the ground in better order for batting. It was expected that that would be to the interest of the match; and it was, the game being one of the most displayed batting ever seen on the grounds. The game opened in a manner very favorable for the Brooklyn club, but in the second inning there became evident to the experienced observer that the Philadelphians were altogether too strong for the Brooklyn patties, and the result—a defeat of the Resolutes by a very creditable display on their part, of 31 to 8—was a foregone one. Both clubs had creditable scores round to be above the Resolutes' mark.

The disparity in the total scores of the match—the Athletes winning by 23 to 14—does not by any means convey the true degree of skill manifested by either of the two departments of the game, the Resolutes really equalling the opposite in many respects, both in batting and fielding. But the superiority of the Athletes in pitching did the deed in this contest.

At the close of the game the Resolute club and their guests were escorted to the Malleon House, where an elegant collation was prepared for them, and where they were joined by the Athletes and enjoyable time was had. The Philadelphians played their last game at Brooklyn, and left for home on the evening train, carrying golden chalk. The reception given the Philadelphians by the Brooklyn boys is the best of any. We spend the score of the match:

DINWIDDIE COURT-HOUSE, VA.

ALTHOUGH this edition is less interesting to the ordinary class of readers than the last, it contains as much with some of the most stirring events of the rebellion unless it worthy of particular notice. In his original and rapid style Mr. Gen. Sheridan reviewed several days in the town and had his headquarters opposite the court-house. Several important skirmishes occurred in the vicinity of the town, between our troops and the rebels, and the building itself will always be a place of interest to the visitor. It may not be reasonable that many of its brick defenders bound their last resting place in the unsolicited neighborhood.

REBEL NAVY YARD AT RICHMOND, VA.

OUR readers will doubtless like to see the navy yard where the rebels constructed their iron clads and other vessels of war, which they pretended that they drive the Union troops from Richmond. The view we have given of the yard is from a sketch made by one of the James river. When the rebel government evacuated the city they set fire to it, and to damage anything that might be useful to the victors, but until there was a large amount of stores unconsumed.

In Australia, Chinamen are beginning to agree largely in criminal and civil cases, the consequence is that many Europeans are losing their cases. In one case, in which several Chinese were concerned, the judge asked a witness for the prosecution whether they would be sworn, each of the Celestials replied: "Probably not."

This caused a hitch in the proceedings there being no necessary oath to administer to the witness. The views of the bench was thus invoked as to where the witness should be sworn, and the reply was as usual expensive: it was to be sworn in. A discussion ensued, which resulted in the witness being sworn in accordance of the gods. A consultation was then despatched to make the necessary arrangements, and the Roman officers awaited the arrival of the chinaware deemed to be necessary. At last the jug, bowl, and chopsticks, the other arrived, having invoiced 2s. 6d. of the public money. In the presence of two policemen the witness then ate plates. The following form of oath was then administered:

"You are to take the whole bowl, and break it; then put the crash; this cup to crack, and you will be cut in two."

The plates were then brought to pieces on the backof a chair.

The importance of ventilating bedrooms is a fact which especially is vitally important in, and which few attend to. If we have to remain in a close room a considerable time, it might let them expect, we may open a window and have some fresh air, but during sleep we are unconscious of the necessity of ventilation. In this case, in which several Chinese were concerned, the judge asked a witness for the prosecution whether they would be sworn, each of the Celestials replied: "Probably not."

This caused a hitch in the proceedings there being no necessary oath to administer to the witness. The views of the bench was thus invoked as to where the witness should be sworn, and the reply was as usual expensive: it was to be sworn in. A discussion ensued, which resulted in the witness being sworn in accordance of the gods. A consultation was then despatched to make the necessary arrangements, and the Roman officers awaited the arrival of the chinaware deemed to be necessary. At last the jug, bowl, and chopsticks, the other arrived, having invoiced 2s. 6d. of the public money. In the presence of two policemen the witness then ate plates. The following form of oath was then administered:

"You are to take the whole bowl, and break it; then put the crash; this cup to crack, and you will be cut in two."

The plates were then brought to pieces on the backof a chair.

REVIEW OF RETURNED PENNSYLVANIA VETERANS.

PHILADELPHIA was the scene of a grand military display on Saturday, June 16th, on occasion being the welcome home of several veteran Pennsylvania regiments. They were received by General Curtin, in the presence of General Meade and his staff. The late commander of the army of the Potomac was received with most lively demonstrations of enthusiasm wherever he appeared. Our illustration represents him as he was passing the reviewing stand at Penn square. On his arrival at this point he was almost literally covered with flowers, the ladies in the stands having been presented to him on the route. During the entire march the streets were densely thronged, and to such a degree, in spite of which the following many persons were injured by the pressure of the crowd, at the Union and Cooper shop saloons, at both of which General Meade and his staff partook of refreshments, and expressed themselves highly gratified with their visit.

THE CITIZENS' ASSOCIATION

Of New York, and their Labors—One of the Monster Evils of the City.

AMONG the many evils which the Citizens' Association of New York has undertaken to demolish—if it cannot be altogether relieved—that monster immorality, the tenement house system is the most exaggeration to declare, that the garbs of evil never invented by the most depraved imagination of the worst human nature, than that promiscuous herding together of men, women and children, which is the inevitable result of the most decent style of tenement. The Association has vindicated both its necessity for its existence, and its ability to combat and break up the operation of countenanced evils, among which is the one we have referred to. The following extract from the Association's Executive Committee—by the unanimous good in this study achieved.

"The Executive Committee would seem to come two years since by a number of wealthy and influential men, who were impressed with the necessity of the city of rescuing from the crowded tenants and oppressions which have too long been allowed, by the apathy of the public, to occupy the most wretched and unhealthy portion of that which ten years ago would have been pronounced habitable. An association was formed, and its objects were seen first among Mr. Simon Hallman, Charles O'Conner, Daniel Lord, Durham B. Eaton, Jerome J. Woodruff, Edward W. Bonney, Alexander Hamilton, jun., Charles Tracy, John A. Weeks, Benjamin D. Silliman, Joseph M. Smith, M.D., Benjamin Ogden, M.D., William Hall, M.D., Alonzo Clark, M.D., Gurdon Buck, M.D., James R. Wood, M.D., Charles Leupp, M.D., Alfred C. Post, M.D., and Isaac E. Taylor, M.D. John W. Draper, M.D., Gulian W. Boerum, M.D., Henry Goulden, M.D., Stephen Smith, M.D., Henry Ward Beecher, Rev. Thomas Hall, M.D., James Brown, V. V. Varnilye, James M. Brown, Robert Ray Hamilton, David Wells, Edward Cooper, Peter Cooper, Jonathan Sturges, Edwin Hoyt, Morris Ketchum, James Bowman Johnston, Nathaniel Smith, M.D., Dr. Stephen Smith, and others, in all about fifty of the public and philanthropic ladies of the city, who have rendered the Association all the assistance in their power, and to visit Albany, and maintain a properly qualified agent there throughout the session of the Legislature, so as to control the various improper schemes that are annually introduced.

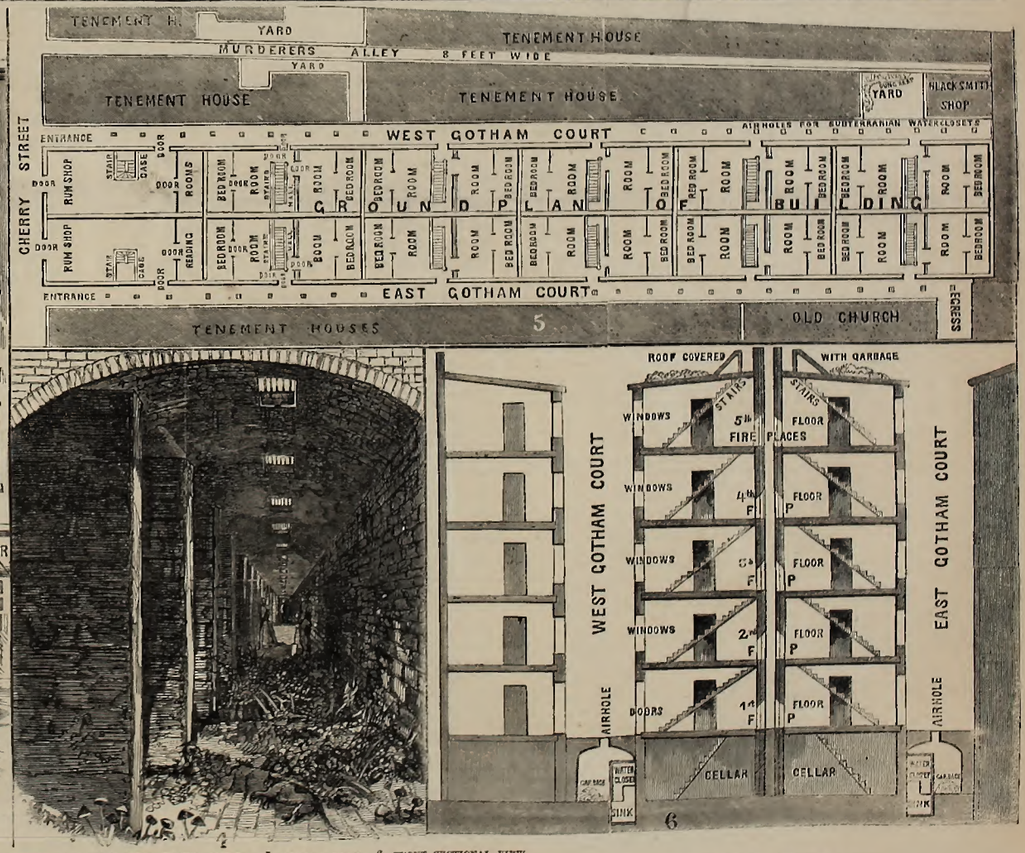
The number of tenements hitherto attended over the whole of Manhattan Island, which was divided into 10 districts, each assigned to a practising physician.

The number of tenements visited by the first month visits less than three families, is 16,811, while the total population of these said tenements is 80,344, and the total resident upon the islands the houses averaging 5½ families, and 27½ persons. Of these, 5,114 are Irish families, and 19,673 persons inhabit them. It is hard to tell how they live without violating the decencies of life, and yet they do it. The rent will give a reasonable further on.

Of these, fifth ward has a death-rate of 1 in 19; the fifteenth—the crowded and busy ward—of 1 in 36, while the last of the city at large is 1 in 45. Of the 16,811 visits of May 1st, 1866, we brought up to this standard, over 7,000 might be annually saved. These horrible pestilence-breeding dens, which disgrace a Christian city, are to be swept away, and the tenants provided with decent and healthful homes. The Association has already achieved a great extent as good an idea as though we were to say that 1,000 or 2,000 families were saved from the terrible horrors of pestilence. The engravings, while they technically represent a particular locality, in reality illustrate the social condition of many of the worst districts in our cities. They are stern pictures of real life, without the smallest shadow of fancy or the faintest touch of romance. They are photographs taken on the spot, and represent two tenement houses, which are situated in Cherry street, near the East Broadway street. When our artist first visited these houses they presented a scene of squalor and misery that language is unequal fever and small-pox had entered many of the apartments, and a fearful harvest of death they reaped before the Association interfered.

If the reader would like to know what terrible people who live in these dens can be driven to for the sole purpose of gratifying an "etching palate," and into what wretched dens and pestilence breeding holes they can be driven, we would refer him to the engraving of purple and fine linen, and live sumptuously every day."

The upper engraving represents the interior of one of these tenements with us.



We turn out of Cherry street into a narrow, blind passage, known in the neighborhood as West Gotham Court. On either side of the entrance stands a grim, lofty, the friend of famine and pestilence. Above each of the court answer to a pump, hung over, half-immersed in a gutter at the doorway; unfitnesses has always its elements of ferm. We step at last from out the row, and ask permission of one of the tenants to enter into her habitation. It consists of two small rooms, the other one of which serves as kitchen, parlor, pantry, and sleeping apartment for the family, consisting of about nine by fourteen feet. The inmates are the of the same length, but narrower by about at least three feet, and is the sleeping-room of the entire family. In this particular instance it contains two beds, which, with the walls, were until lately swarming with disgusting vermin. The occupant informs us now, however, that the agent had given her some "powther," and told her to keep the "door and window closed and burn time in the room, and she would soon get rid of the boogs;" that before she "was most ate up wid 'em."

We next descended, by a steep, slimy staircase, to the subterranean regions. The floor of the cellar (soft, spongy earth) is covered with blue mould and the depository of heaps of nameless filth. Under the court are the privy vaults and sewer. The former have undergone a process of purification since our artist's first visit; the latter remains pretty nearly the same—a stagnant pool, breeding contagion and death. Escaping from this worse than inquisitorial dungeon as soon as a proper survey will permit, we ascend to the roof. Some improvements have also been made here since our artist's introductory visit his presence, with his sketch-book and pencil, having, we understand, been reported to the landlord or his agent.

After a careful inspection of this block of houses, and ascertaining that each family, no matter what the number of its members, has the same space—two rooms—we pass on to make a call at another of the same class in Murderer's alley. Here, as in the other inferno, the entrance is guarded by two grog shops. It makes one shudder to reflect that helpless innocent childhood must be continually surrounded by the vitiating magnetism of such a locality, and that men and women, through a whole life, can never escape from the disgrace of having been reared in a place that bears the mark of Cain upon its front. The passage is about six feet in width at the entrance, gradually contracting as we advance, until, at the farther exit it cannot be more than two and a half or three feet wide. The houses here are in a more cleanly condition than the ones we have just left; but their occupants have the same squalid, filthy appearance. The space occupied by each family is about the same as in West Gotham court, and the price per month similar, running from $4 50 to $6 per month, according to the floor.

Now let us compute the number of human souls crowded into the first block of houses which we first inspected. Fronting on West Gotham court are six double houses, each containing 10 families; back of this, in the same block, fronting on West Gotham court, is a like number of houses, containing a like number of families, in all 240; each family will average five members; so that we have in this one block no less than 1,200 persons, all huddled within a space which, if the locality was wholesome, is not sufficiently large to properly accommodate one-tenth of the number.

The consequences of such a state of things are worthy of the most serious consideration. Stagnant water and decaying garbage generate contagion, disease spreads, and a whole neighborhood soon becomes infected by the unhealthy condition of a single tenement. This is a matter which affects the lofty as well as the lowly, for all are contiguous in crowded cities. The pestilence radiates from the courts and alleys to the squares and avenues. We do not know exactly what the rate of yearly mortality is in the houses that we describe; but in some of a similar character it is one in seven, while in the more habitable portions of the metropolis it is one in sixty—the rate in the whole city being one in thirty-five.

The condition of a large proportion of the tenement houses is one that ought to be brought before the proper authorities in a manner that will not permit them longer to shrink from their proportion of the responsibility. It is a burning shame that New York, the metropolis of a comparatively new country, a city that pays more money than London, Paris and Berlin inclusive, for the maintenance of her municipal government, does not insist upon having the sanitary regulations so administered, that the rate of mortality would not be eight and a half times greater in one locality than another.

WIDOW MYSIE.

O SWEET was Widow Mysie, sweet and blest,
The peach's blush and down were on her cheek,
And there were dimples in her tender chin
For Cupid's small to hunt for honey in;
Dark silvery were her eyelids, curls a prize,
And wicked, wicked were her braided eyes
Flung you her figure, rounded and complete,
And look—as for a free inviting feast!
All this was nothing to the warmth and light
That seemed to hover o'er her day and night;
Winsome in all moved, she seemed to soothe and please
With honeyed murmurs as of honeyed bees.
Her smile was sunshine on pebble-mirrored flow
Like snow-white doves that flying crow and coo;
Her feet fell patter, chirp, the little rules,
Her breath was soft as south escape and wins repose;
And when in danger—so!—your hand would press,
You'd feel her heart with trembling throb
While her dark eyes, with beseeching aims in scorn,
Plead all mankind on the mercy of your own,
Declaring your spirit such a wicked man
That scemed more innocent than innocence!

Sure one so beauteous and so sweet had grieved
And cheer'd the scene, wherever by Fortune placed;
But with a background of the poorer bright,
Whose every line was a theme of rosy light,
With jingling glasses round her, and a sound
Of spice and aromas-pots where'er she went,
What wonder she should be the cynosure soon
An angel in a cloud of tobacco-smoke!
What wonder, I said, it got up close one day,
She and the white boy stole my heart away?

ONLY A CLOD.

CHAPTER XXVII.—BEING A CLOD.

Despite the perpetual influence of his friend and lender, Harcourt Lowther, Mr. Tredethlyn's days and nights were not fully occupied that he had ever little leisure for reflection. Day by day the fashionable master tanght his deadly lesson; day by day the luckless pupil took his lesson's prescription without demur. The single, perfect exception was he malleable as clay under the practised hand of a modeller, and took any shape Mr. Lowther chose to give it.

Friends was fully impressed with the idea that his young kinsman had developed a lovely vein of benevolence never be given to him. All that fastidious of hopes and dreams which had been in which he had once fondly hidden had vanished, but surely understood, and there was nothing left to its nightmares but the memory that it once had been. A thought of Sophy Gilbert brought now with anger and bitterness. Could he have ever been so mad, so blind, so besotted, as to believe that in that girl's strange, perplexingly fascinating an atmosphere of frivolity and adulation, would never fail her? Was he quite tenderly in his first love? Oddly, recalled to the sense of his declining years and penny wisdom by their friendly Mr. Lang, actually managing more thoughtfully of his lovely Venetian inside than Frances Hamilton of Mandeville or months' duration, as by his old friend's desire, and the young was sent to do the work which, the midnight was chosen as hour. With thirty thousand a year, and a handsome estate, he need have no anxiety for reflection? It is all very well for Mr. Kenney Hayward, having failed to obtain wealth or prefer ment, to prate from a world which has cast him off, and meditate upon the transitory nature of such things; but he has been amiable as nobody but old youth and lately tormented per sonally, and can need be hoped by such a fortunate man as Mr. Lowther. Harcourt Lowther had his best friend from the gloomy interior to assuming that Francis Tredethlyn's misfortune had made her perpetual lover of never and resentment. But though you may carry a man from one corner to race course, by driving, you cannot get through the luggage of the mind; though you may steep him to the brain and drowning that; though you may drug him above the reach of mind nurse to leave him, his mind exhibits have lost their power, to accompany him to the most desperate conflicts and gaslight cabin, you cannot prevent him thinking. The involuntary process goes on in spite of him. He will dream, and dreaming of Sophy Gilbert, and of the Haymarket, in an express train rushing towards Newmarket at sixty miles an hour, on the last night of a gambler's drag, on the rattling interior of an aristocratic amateur Brougham, on the downs at Epsom; yes, even as the final flash, which was to set a wizard to control the power of sight upon one speck of color, the man's mind, in spite of himself, was drawn to fasten on the chestnut colt association, will wander away in spite of him—to moon above a bishop's grave, to sit amidst a parliament of horrors and a cabinet in a still summer twilight, trifling with the rings on a woman's hand.

There were times when thought would come to Francis Tredethlyn, in spite of all his friends's watchful care. He would sit at the head of a dinner-table, at the Crown and Sceptre, at any vacancy of the fussy wine-bubbles in his shallow glass, and thinking how pretty he might have been at Marble Hall only last—Ah, this poor substitute of mine instead of mine—this pitiful friend of a daughter in place of the pure gold of happiness—how miserable a mockery it was even at the best!

Mr. Lowther generally broke up such gloomy reveries as these by calling to the waiter to encourage his friend's shallow glass for a tumbler. But there are people of regret which cannot be lulled to slumber by all the sparkling wines that were ever grown in the fair champagne country, and Harcourt Lowther sometimes found his work very difficult.

But amidst such perpetual hurry and excitement it was only natural that some things should be also entirely forgotten by Francis Tredethlyn, and amongst these forgotten things were the services of his amusing cousin. The Gray's Inn lawyers had ever been, and would have employed all the decisive machinery in London in a search for Susan Tredethlyn, after Susan Leahy, had they so chosen, but were intensely respectable family solicitors in the west of few coaches, and Messrs. Ingoldby, having once conducted the business with the insertion of an occasional advertisement in the second column of the Times supplement, informing their cousin that a young lady in search of service to her advantage on applying at their office; and further offering a liberal reward for any information respecting the whereabouts of the young lady.

The advertisement did not entirely escape notice. A good many Susan Leahys presented themselves; one a fat old woman of seventy, who kept a tobacconist's shop in the neighborhood of Seven Dials; another a fierce and pugilistic-looking Irishwoman with fiery red hair and a fine south of friend brogue, who threatened dire vengeance on the lawyers when he refused her exorbitant sum to swear to her of something to her advantage. All the Susan Leahys were ready to swear anything, in order to get the money, and to take advantage of whatever might be anything, from a five pound note to a million of money, or a dormant peerage. Over all these applicants Mr. Ingoldby, under Mr. Rusable's cross-questioning, and he did not even mention Francis Tredethlyn to confirm the false agents.

So, amid November meetings and Greenwich dinners, debauch, and Haymarket, and Cremorne, boy, poor Susan's route image melted quite away, and Francis forgot the solemn promise he had had made, and never kept to his dying mother's befriend Harcourt Lowther. Francis had been left by his father a small sum of money to be changed hands after the Derby, the Leger, part of it finding its way into the pockets of Mr. Tredethlyn's creditors, part of it into those of Mr. Lowther, redeemed his fortune, but the day was over, and Francis drove home amongst the noisy rush of London and the fog, with a few hundred pounds in cards, and heavily linked sociables, tax-carts and contemporaries borrows, with the outer leaves of an attenuated dividend-warrant in his waistcoat pocket, and the dim consciousness that he had distributed hastily scribbled cheques to the amount of some thousands of pounds, which were floating in his brain. He drove to town through the spring twilight with Dick Sheridan in his hat and a heavy pain in his heart. The poignet needs of many of his companions were scarcely more false and hollow than their gaiety.

Of course it would be impossible to conclude such a day without a dinner. The sort of people who generally dine together on the Derby evening, dining and giving dinners, only the dinner-giver no as one to wonty of the diners; so at some time or other every one of the Derby dinners had found himself to his mutual place at the head of a glittering table, in an odorous atmosphere of champagne and cigar-smoke, and with the dining-up headache, that was intensified by every jingle of glasses and rattle of knives and forks.

At last at last, and Mr. Tredethlyn crept under the warm May sunshine on the Downs. To lose cheerfully is given to many men, but how very few of them can preserve their self-possession when their pockets opportunities in a rather uproarious spirit. Francis Tredethlyn was not one of these wonder, and making new engagements right and left, he was the same losing by whose shortcomings he had lost his own. Perhaps he was the only one of the soundness of his own judgment in despite of the misfortune of to-day.

He was in the house now at the head of the dinner-table, though the sound of his own voice by no means improved the splitting pain in his head. He was in the house now at the head of no more voices, through which one sober and distinct tone, sitting next Mr. Tredethlyn, made a vain effort to attract his attention. It was the voice of a waiter, waiting on the coming events, gave general invitation to the Grand Stand at Virginia Water on the Ascot cup day, and galloped madly away on the road to ruin in which Harcourt Lowther had not long gone. That galling headache of his was getting worse every minute, when some one proposed an adjournment to a adjacent theatre.

Francis had been sitting next to the waiter. A West End waiter is no mean dramatic critic though he never sees a play; the opinion of which he has overheard so usually decides the success more loudly than the speech of the actor. The waiter opinion that the best entertainment in London was to be had at Drury Lane, where a melo-laamatic spectacle of some celebrity was being played that evening for the last time but one.

Inspired by the waiter, Mr. Tredethlyn's party voted that very thing, leaving Mr. Vere Devilish along with them, indifferent where he went, and carrying his headache with him every where.

It was past ten o'clock, and the last scene of the great spectacle was on, when Francis was full, and the audience was chiefly of that mature and vociferous order we to drop into a theatre at midnight on great race nights. Mr. Tredethlyn and his party could only and standing-room at the back of the dress circle, and from the position Francis beheld the grand final tableau.

The piece was an adaptation of some great Parisian success—some story of the Reign of Terror—and in the last scene the stage was crowded by a champagne populace. Upwards of three hundred men, women and children were engaged in the scene. Heroes and mirfons, the picturesque well-dressed of the provincial peasantry, the scarlet cap of liberty, the cocked hats of the sansculottes—all blended in one grand mass of movement and color, which the royal action of the piece drew to its triumphant close.

Mr. Tredethlyn did not trouble himself to wonder what the piece had been about. He saw somebody killed—a villain it was to be supposed, and a hero rescued by a well organized pell-mell of fighting; then there was a reconciliation, an embrace, a young lady in white muslin clasped to the bosom of a young man in a leopard-skin cloak and low top-boots, adorned with many-colored bunches of ribbon. Then the band broke into the lively measure of the Marseillaise Hymn, the crowd clamored a shrill chorus, and the curtain fell.

It was while the curtain was descending very slowly to that triumphant music that Francis Tredethlyn saw something which startled him like the sight of a ghost.

It was a face—a woman's face in a high Norman cap, shining over the many faces in the crowd—a thin, worn, melancholy countenance, very sad to look upon, among all those other faces flushing for the moment with a stereotyped smile.

"My God!" cried Mr. Tredethlyn, clasping his two hands upon his hot forehead, and pushing back the hair from all his face in his astonishment. "What is the matter with me? I look as if I'll seen a ghost!"

There were a few minutes before the melo-dramatic finale little production popularly known as a "scene-shifting" farce. It was not the most studious audience, but the conversation, and his distinguished gentleman in certain tartan trousers being perpetually mistaken for another gentleman in tartan trousers, while both gentlemen were alternately sitting upon bonnet-boxes and dropping trays of crockery.

There was nothing in that very much in the farce, but the audience laughed impetuously, and Francis Tredethlyn's party joined in the laughter. A friend named Hamilton, so, and loudly as the rest of them, but amidst all that confusion and clamor he was, at last, able to see plainly again the face of rouge upon his hollow cheek kept surging up over and anon out of the chaos of his brain, and haunting him like the face of a ghost.

Who was it? What was it? Was it some accidental likeness? Was it a face that he had seen and known in his boyhood? Was it possibly, Clara's dead sister, who had been so prompt to obey nobilary orders, so strict in the performance of Sheridan's wife? Was it a modified scene of his fancy? Was he mad, or was he only drunk? He paused to ship him to-night. The author of "What will he do with it?" tells us that Francis Tredethlyn was the most temperate of topers; "there was the brain like ice, while making on the palate like fire." Mr. Tredethlyn had been drinking a mixture of drivers-champagne and Moselles all day long, and he tried in vain to fix the vague image which had startled him in the midst of a laugh.

He went home in the early gray of the May morning, but not to sleep. He lay tossing from side to side, tormented by that preternatural wakefulness which is apt to succeed a long period of riot and excitement. The scenes at Epsom, the gypsy fortune-teller, the betting man in white hats and green vels, the Dutch dolls and gilt cakes pincushions, the dust and clamor of the locomotive, the jingling of bridle chains, the popping of corks, the revolutionary crowd in the drama, the certain trousers and broken tunic-bodice in the farce—all mixed themselves in his brain, falling to pieces and putting themselves together and mixing up with the face of the rouge.

Mr. Lowther, coming to see his friend at the earliest visiting hour, found Francis still in bed, and with a headache like Ossa, which he had inflicted up for himself at Harcourt's instigation, as a bedroom and dressing-room, a kind of refuge to which he had retired when he was unable any longer to encounter the calm gaze of Maude's clear blue eyes fixed upon him in sovereign wonder. Her woman's love had not quite recovered the cold kindness since that unlucky encounter on the stairs. She was still kind to him, but he could see that it was kindness only, and that she believed nothing of her old friendliness. He could see this, and the confidence of it galled him to the quick. Harcourt Lowther's work was more than half done by this time. He had no longer any reason to fear Francis Tredethlyn's success at the Carnisham no longer caused him uneasiness.

Mr. Tredethlyn had not very long fallen into a heavy sleep after receiving his usual morning's weariness, when his friend called upon him. Harcourt seated himself by the side of the morning table, and began a contemplation of the sleeper, while he spoke to the valet who had admitted him to the darkened chamber.

"You must have been up all four o'clock, Jervis," he said. "At four give him some soda water, and at five make an appointment with me at half-past five. Take care that he doesn't oversleep himself. I have to dine him by way of reminder."

He wrote a little memorandum to remind him, and wrote a few lines on a sheet of note-paper:

"DEAR TREDETHLYN,—Remember your engagement at my chambers at half-past 5.30 always. You had better bring the mail phaeton, and can give me a lift to the 'S. and S.'

"Yours faithfully,

"H. L."

He slipped the note in an envelope, and dipped his pen into the ink, but before writing the address he stopped suddenly, and tore the note into fragments.

"He might see it!" he muttered, thoughtfully "and that might show him the nature of my cards. The only wise man in the one who can do his work without that most dangerous of all machinery—pen and paper. Poor Francis! he looks a little worn."

Mr. Lowther looked down upon the sleeper with the most benign expression. He had no dislike whatever to the simple Cornishman; he had only to do with the plans.

These fellows who come suddenly into a large fortune are sure to kill themselves before they have done spending it," he murmured, consequently. "Harcourt," he said, as he went out, "don't forget your master's engagement. Hold better drive up to my place in the mail phaeton."

Mr. Lowther's "place" was the same lodging which he had taken for himself when he first returned to England. He was in a position now as he was not a vulgar advantage; and in all his dealings with Francis Tredethlyn he had engaged upon that gentleman's purse for so much as five-pound notes. He had his plans; but like your pet's the plans of a man who never has hand to mouth. He won a good deal of his friend's money; but he never cheated Francis out of a sixpence. His winnings were fair, and which must always accompany skill and experience as opposed to ignorance and inexperience. In the meantime, Harcourt Lowther had made the best he might on his winnings and a small allowance made him by his mother.

The Lowthers were great people in their way, and Harcourt had admission to some of the best houses in London. He was very well received as that circle in which Maude Tredethlyn had taken her place, and contrived somehow or other to be present for an hour or so at most of the parties in which she appeared; though to break away from the haunts of fashionmism, to drop into a public club, and then to appear in Belgravia in the same evening, was almost as difficult as a telegraphic jump in a pantomime. Harcourt Lowther did this very frequently, and left very often and Maude Tredethlyn, enjoying all the privileges of a matron, and having herself constantly about amongst the statues and candles on a crowded staircase in Tyburnia, talking with Harcourt Lowther about the weather, and what he talked in the old summer evenings by the quiet river.

Sometimes Lowther back upon such a meeting, Maude felt that there was a very great wonder for having taken something of the old tone; but could she blame him for the lowered accents of his voice, for the light in his eyes, for the unconscious tenderness into which he was betrayed in those public meetings, when she remembered how he had left her in the cold winter in her home? Never yet had he presumed upon his intimacy with the husband in order to intrude himself on the privacy of the wife. Was there room or danger, then, if, in crowded assemblies, he surrounded all manner of small difficulties to get to her side by way to ferret out a word? Was it matter if he flowered just a little longer than he was, or could say all sorts of pretty things? It is rather a pleasant thing for a friendless young married woman, secure in the consciousness of her own purity, to know that a man who is not breaking for her as a gentlemanly way. Award too much, a toast, a book, and Maude would have been a dreary world indeed from which she was from the venomous fangs of some deadly reptile; but Harcourt Lowther knew better than to speak to her of love, and his own plans, and he was carrying them out in his own way; neither by word nor deed he ever set foot upon the soil of Tredethlyn; but now, when he tried to cut a path for himself through the convolutions of her friendship he found himself in a position which he found to make way for him, and it was considered a settled thing that he should be found somewhere near Maude. He had very offended her; he had only compromised her.

Francis awoke before the hour at which his friend had left word that he was to be called, and a glance was almost a sunscreen, for the Cornishman still retained, of his old nature, the simple, undemonstrative habit of the country man with upon himself. He got up at four o'clock, and had nearly completed his toilet when the servant brought the soda and found his prescribing Harcourt Lowther.

"And if you please, sir, you were to be so good as to make an appointment with Mr. Lowther at half past five, and was so please to drive the mail phaeton to his place," said the valet, while his master drank the revivifying beverage.

"Very good," muttered Mr. Tredethlyn, with something like a groan; "you can tell Mr. Lowther the pleasure for five o'clock. Is Mrs. Tredethlyn at home?"

"No, sir."

The man departed, and Francis finished dressing. He had ten minutes to spare after finishing his toilet, and he sat down to look at the newspaper which lay ready cut on his writing-table. He took up the paper, but ever stood steadily at the advertisement sheet. His head still ached, in spite of a shower-bath, and a vigorous application of hard hair-brushes; but his intellect was a good deal clearer than it had been before he dressed.

Suddenly, as he ran the advertisement sheet, vivid as the figure of Banquo at Macbeth's unconformable supper-party, there arose before him a face—was it the face of the rouge?

"Great heavens!" he cried; "I didn't know her!"

The ghost that he had seen upon the previous night was the ghost of the woman he had so long been looking for—his cousin Susan.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—"OH, MY ANN, MINE NO SOUND!"

FRANCIS TREDETHLYN drove his friend down to Richmond in a hansom cab, and in the leisurely spoke half a dozen words throughout the journey, and Harcourt Lowther, leaving the watchful eye of the master upon his pupil, saw that something was amiss.

Now although Mr. Cornishman's guide and counsel had his pious, very dubious plans, as closely drawn out as the great Duke's arrangements for Waterloo, which nonsuccess victory was not quite the lucky accident our neighbors imagine it to have been—yet he was far too wise a diplomatist not to ignore the the sublime opportunities which chance sometimes throws in the way of a schemer, chattering the complicated machinery so dexterously and patiently put together, and opening a new and easy way to success over the ruins of the old road.

Mr. Lowther was quite prepared to make good use of any accident which seemed likely to help him. He was like a chess-player who takes his place before the board with a perfect plan of action mapped out in his mind, and who may use his entire scheme overthrown, his most brilliant arrangements mystified by the first move of his adversary; but who will win the game nevertheless, after his enemy's fashion, if not after his own, being no stickler for the advice of old players, but only a man of the world, resolutely bent on success. Upon this particular affair Harcourt was not that omnibus had gone amiss with his friend, and he was bent on discovering what the something was. With this view he had resort to the wonderful creature Iago was, by the-by, to precisely what one considers that he took all that trouble for no better motive than jealous whisper about a wife, but considered like a dog in the envious grudge of Cassio's advancement. Ah, my divine William, that's the only flaw in your masterwork—you have no power last with you for your ponderous machinery! Now if Othello had been the owner of thirty thousand a year and a beautiful wife, as Iago lived, there might have been some reason for the exhibition of a little Italian diplomacy. But Iago! Iago! Oh, the beauty of a motive. The pet wickedness of a woman. Your novelist cannot write a story, your playwright cannot devise a drama, but he must have recourse to revenge to keep the action going. Yet in the history of men, how small and pitiful a part the human passion has played! A General condemns a Charles Stuart to the scaffold. For revenge? No; simply because Charles is in his way. A Robespierre sends everyone to the scaffold of his enemies, and yet I doubt if he bore a hearty grudge against one of his victims—a little political jealousy perhaps at the worst. A Napoleon extinguishes the haughty noblesse of France —out of revenge? No; but the noblesse interfere with the existence of my lord Napoleon. A Cromwell or Essex pounces her husband—revenge—not a bit of it, but because she wants to marry some one else; and even Sir Thomas Overbury must die, not that any one hates the man, but the creature he so favors must. Isabella Stuart pines in a prison; and the heads of the regicides rot on Temple Bar; and Charles, oh merry monarch, the pet of the puritans and romancers, the man whose sins have been dealt with so lightly that we are apt to mistake them for virtues—can be as hard as Nero, when he sees him that the guards Russell and Sidney should perish in their prime; and James II. sends young Monmouth to the block. Why? Is it from the impulse that makes these men's hearts? Not at all. Not man's passionate hatred of his neighbor, but man's cooler love of himself is the motive power that moves the headsman's arm, and hide the swooping eye descend upon fair young necks from which the lovelocks have been newly shorn. Revenge. Pshaw! Hasit a feather's weight in the balance of misery? Is the forgery of our land, with the revenge to answer for? A semi-mythical Rossmond poisoned in her bower—an Essex condemned to punishment, and lamented in dreary league by the queen who loved him—a Konigsmark's handsome face trampled upon by a German tigress!

With such random reflections as these, Mr. Lowther beguiled the time of the drive to Richmond. During dinner, and throughout the evening he watched his friends closely; but all the fascinations of the fair Rose were powerless to make Francis Tredethlyn from the thoughtful mood. Indeed the Bohemian had a charming faculty for enjoying himself under all circumstances and with any reference to the host and paymaster, who was generally looked at rather in the light of a bore and an interloper, by a head at the lower end of the board. Some of Mr. Tredethlyn's new friends had christened him the Sorrowful Evil; and to-night, while he sat moodily brooding over the sorrow of his cousin, pretty lips made faces at the company over his shoulder; and two or three gentlemen were playful than the rest, amused herself and her acquaintances by filling the pockets of his dress coat with the empty shells of the lobsters and the corks of the champagne.

For the rest, what did it matter in what dreary regions his thoughts wandered, so long as he was there to write a cheque for the bill. Only one pair of eyes looked at him, and any sheet of notepaper, and those eyes watched him as the serpent watches the bird, with an deadly a purpose, with as quiet a stare, and with as much as slowly as he was to-night, there was something in Francis Tredethlyn's mind which Harcourt Lowther could not read quite as easily as a page in an open book, and as it was his habit to read most things relating to the Cornishman.

"What does it matter?" thought Mr. Lowther, abandoning himself to reflection again during the homeward drive. "Let him keep his secret from me if he likes, and I'll use it for my own benefit when he plays against me. He is my dummy, and he plays my game. When he hands a suit of his own choosing I am ready on his right hand with a master of small trumps. Play as he will he can scarcely throw me out. What does it matter how the game is won, so long as one scores the odd trick ?"

The day after this Richmond dinner was Sunday. But even that circumstance did not prevent Francis Tredethlyn from talking preliminary steps towards finding the missing girl, whom he fancied was now within his reach now, since it seemed certain that she face he had seen on the stage of Drury Lane was the face of his uncle Oliver's daughter, and no other. It had been his habit, until very lately, to accompany Maude every Sunday morning to a certain fashionable place of worship, and before the divine service, which always fancies lamented their iniquities and their wretchedness, and the subdued rustling of silk at a sermon's end, and an atmosphere that was odorous with Jookey Club and Eau Rouquet. But Star and Garter dinners, and other dissipations of mysterious localities at the West End are by no means conducive to early rising; and now the Sabbath bells that Mr. Tredethlyn had been wont to hear ringing blithely in the morning air while he breakfasted with his wife, were apt to mingle with his dreams, and sometimes he would awaken to find himself into the veil of an alarm bell summoning the firemen's succor for pertaining watches in the dreary habitations of the bell on board a boat leaving a pier—a boat which the dreamer was, oh, so eagerly striving to reach, but never could reach; just as his foot was going to step upon the deck, the plank on which he trod would give way and fall into the water. Sometimes it was a raging headache perhaps, and a dull, ceaseless pain in his breast, which he scarcely cared to acknowledge even to himself, that troubled him.

So now Mr. Tredethlyn was apt to spend the earlier part of his Sunday morning in fitful slumber, and that a very portion of the day in the society of his devoted friends. Unhappily Mr. Phipstophelus his such a knack of thrusting himself upon one at all hours, and paying his society Faust is apt to find life very dreary without that fatal companionship. Perhaps the Bohemian, whose manners were natural to him, Francis was only a helpless creature, with all the dismal blank of an unoccupied day before him, and no one to share it.

But upon this particular Sunday he had a purpose of his own, and the honest energy with which he set about carrying out that purpose transformed him into a new being.

Harcourt Lowther might have felt a little twinge of jealousy had he known with what a bright face from the stuccoed district, with the old light in his eyes, the old lightness in his firm tread, Francis Tredethlyn left the house on the wing out, and an idyllied wife who did not love him. He forgot everything, except that he was free, and that he had something new, to fulfil a long-neglected duty.

For Uncle Oliver's money brought her peace of mind, and prosperity for the father she loves so dearly," thought Mr. Tredethlyn. "Let me remember that when I think of his disinherited daughter."

Crumpled in one of the pockets of his overcoat was a playbill announcing the name of the performances at Drury Lane, and in the long list of names crowded together at the bottom of the bewildering London, he discovered the name of Percies and Vavasours, Vane Tempests and Lewesson Gowers, and such appellations as the corps de ballet modestly conceal under the plain, single name of Turner. He concluded, therefore, that his cousin had declined being known at the Drury Lane theatre, as well as at Coltonclough, and he did not anticipate much difficulty in finding her, for remembering that she had confided to him certain matters might have seemed rather a hopeless thing on a Sunday, but Francis Tredethlyn's character was not that of a hopeless thing.

"I have wasted too many hours already," he thought. "Where my poor lost girl is concerned every moment is of importance to me now."

He took a hansom and drove straight to the theatre, but Drury Lane on a Sunday seems as much deserted as the Coltonclough moors, the stage door was closed. The box office might have been the tomb of the Pharaohs, for all the response of it by within its portals. Happily Francis was not to be disheartened. He walked up and down the pavement for half an hour, and at last was able to tell him where the stage doorkeeper lived, but she was not able to give him any information as to the habitation of the leader of the ballet.

"Most of them live out at Camberwell, or up Islington way; though how they manage it, poor things! seems a mystery to me," said the woman, with all sorts of weather, is more than I can tell. They don't even get a cab, most of them, but walk with their half pint of porter and their sandwich, and that's about all the dinner they get on such days, I dare say."

Thus, discursively, the barmaid. Francis left her, and made his way to the adjacent court, in which the doorkeeper lived, and he was in his private capacity. That gentleman was in the midst of a very greasy dinner and in the bosom of his family when Mr. Tredethlyn knocked at the door, and was at first inclined to resent the interruption.

"I'm not a-going to be disturbed and forty times addressed in my blessed head," he remarked in an injured tone, "which our company, as the beginning of the season we ever was hunted and forty-nine; and I don't care to be hunted upon Sundays, when I'm eating my dinner, for a pack of ballet girls. I don't get paid for that when I take my salary. If any young swell wants to find out one of our ladies' address, to leave 'em a book, or to take a ticket for their benefit, or such like, I should think they could find it out of a week-day and not come chirping of a man over his Sunday's victuals."

But a judiciously administered half-sovereign had a very soothing effect upon the mind and manners of the doorkeeper. There are so few things in a small way which cannot be done with half a sovereign. The man laid down his knife and fork and applied himself to serious reflection, while his wife and family suspended their operations to stare admiringly at the fashionably-dressed intruder.

"Let me see," said the doorkeeper, scraping his stubbly chin as he mused, "there's such a many of 'em that I may sit here trying to remember where this here Miss Turner lives till doomday, and not be no nearer. I'll tell you what I'll do sir, you sir; I've got the addresses of every member of the company in my book over the way. I'll slip over and get Miss Turner's direction, while you wait here, if you like."

"Over the way" was Drury Lane theatre. The doorkeeper took some penknives from a nail over the mantelpiece, and put on his hat. Francis Tredethlyn went with him.

"Turner?" said the man—"Turner? A pale-faced young woman, ain't she? Looks as if she has gone through an end of trouble. She's only an extra, took on for this here great piece what's just done with."

"An extra?" inquired Francis.

"Yes; a sort of supernumerary—not a regular ballet-girl—can't dance, or anything of that sort, but they're pretty enough to do on. I remember her—a very quiet, civil-spoken young person."

The address was soon found; it was at a house in Bryant-street, Pimlico. Francis left the doorkeeper with his heart beating tumultuously, his face pale as the cambric that was held up, half spine-fy at finding her at last, when hope had almost died out into forgetfulness—pain at finding her thus. Ah, you! you who have to remember the interests of every free peeping out of a dainty bonnet, and to know that sorrow had set its undesirable hand upon that pretty face, and that she face he remembered had no more a place upon this earth.

"Miss Turner and Miss Willoughby live together in a very respectable way," answered the shoemaker's wife, with the further information to spell the spelt twice. Mr. Tredethlyn found that the house was detached, and that the door of the shop was ajar, and the atmosphere about and around it seemed greasy with the steam of cabbage and boiled meat. The bell which Francis rang was answered by a care-worn looking woman of middle age, who had a look of Adelaide Neilson, a flimsy smartness of appeal, which was more plainly demonstrative of poverty than absolute shabbiness. She was never known to wear gloves, and her hands were always covered with rings.

"Miss Turner lives here, I believe?" Francis said, standing on the threshold of the passage.

"Miss Turner did live here," the woman answered, "but she has left."

"Why? Where?" for at the theatre only the night before last, and the doorkeeper has just directed me here."

"Miss Turner's engagement expired last night, sir, and she left London this morning."

"This morning—only this morning! But of course you know her address. She has gone? I am her first cousin, her only surviving relative. If I had known that there was the least chance of her leaving London, I should have tried to find her last night. Will you be kind enough to direct me to her?"

The woman shook her head.

"I don't know where Miss Turner has gone, she said.

Francis Tredethlyn's face whitened to the very lips.

"My God!" he exclaimed, "is there a fatality in this business? Am I never to find her?"

Then, addressing himself to the woman with a more curious look, he said:

"For pity's sake, if you can help me in my difficulty, do so with all your might. You do not know how my mind is disturbed by finding her. I scarcely think I should say too much if I were to tell you that I am her nearest friend and death, for I was my cousin's face the night before last, and it looked to me like a face that is fading away from this world. Pray, pray tell me where she has gone, to give no one her address; but she did not think her cousin Francis would come to ask for it. Pray trust me, and tell me where I am the only friend that poor girl has in this world."

"I have told you the truth, sir," answered the woman, firmly, "and I do not know where Miss Turner has gone. Anything I can tell you about her, I shall be happy to tell," she added, as a thought struck her, "but I am sleepy in Francis Tredethlyn's face; "but it is very little. Will you step upstairs to my room? It is only an humble one, but it is better than none here."

This could scarcely fail to be true, for during the very brief interview which had just taken place, Francis had been hemmed against and pushed some half-dozen times by young persons with jaunty, flaring bonnets, on their way to and from a neighboring public-house. It was the popular dinner-hour in Drury Lane, and four separate floors, with their inmates differing as to their habits, were more or less engaged in the business of dining.

Francis followed his cousin's late associate, Miss Willoughby, up the narrow, dirty stair-case, with its pipe upon which little colonies of children had established themselves here and there with their toys. One large family, consisting of a tender years was trying to fly a kite in the well of the staircase, with a perseveringly interrupted and unsuccessful issue and the heads of the parents below, while a young lady, belonging to an adjacent tribe or section, was heard to sing a song in a shrill, wheezy, cracked voice, from the topmost floor.

Miss Willoughby conducted Francis to a back room upon the third floor, a dark, gloomy little room, hung with chocolate and drab paper, bay cultivened by a little gallery of theatrical photographs, and some engraved portraits cut out of Ladies' Companions, neatly arranged over the mantelpiece.

It was not very difficult to perceive that the anomalous piece of furniture, which was too vividly brown for mahogany, too elaborately grained for oak, and which was neither the one nor the other, nor all together a wardrobe, was neither more nor less than a member of the mysterious family of pseudo-bedsteads. It was not difficult to perceive that industrious poverty and simple industrious respect in that three pair back, whose pitiful gentility and shabby, and worthless scraps of ornament, were arranged with an exquisite neatness as to partake the appearance of a bachelor in the Albany, or a gem of the Foundours St. Hospet.

"I shall make your cousin very well," said Miss Willoughby; "we got on so nicely together."

"She lived with you? Here?" asked Francis.

"Yes; we shared the expenses equally, the rent came lighter for both of us, and apartments are so dear in London; and of course it was the same advantage to each, not that we wanted many for our little bit of cooking, but one can't even boil a kettle without a fire; and savings and economies are apt to pull upon one after a long continuance; so having Miss Turner to live with me made it both cheap and very much pleasanter besides which we always were the best of friends."

Mr. Tredethlyn was slow to answer. He was looking round the room, and on the hidden bed floating on the surface of a dingy leaden ocean, visible athwart some scarecrow garniture, which looked like the sails of a ship upon a short allowance of mould. Everything in the place, from the uninspired morsel of worn carpet, which only made a patch of Kidderminster in a dreary desert of boards, to the handful of red coals that burned brightly between massive enamelments of brick, from the dresses in the wardrobe which struggles and outlaws. An open cupboard stored Francis's eye, and he saw, on a shelf, a pitiful morsel of shiny complexioned ham, lying cheek by jowl with the leg end of a stale half-quartern loaf. He looked at these things, and remembered the house in which he lived, the reckless extravagance that pervaded all his life.

"Does she sing to the gold of a miser?" he thought; "and is my uncle Oliver's child never to know any profit from the wealth her father scraped and plodded together, at the cost of everything that makes life endurable?"

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH AND ITS COMPLETION IN ENGLAND.

On Monday, May 29th, the bulk of the great new vessel to be named the Great Eastern World was completed, and went through the last of the preliminary trials in England, in the presence of a large number of distinguished electrician engineers, and scientific men, as well as the leading scientific gentlemen, including the Directors of the Telegraph Maintance Company.

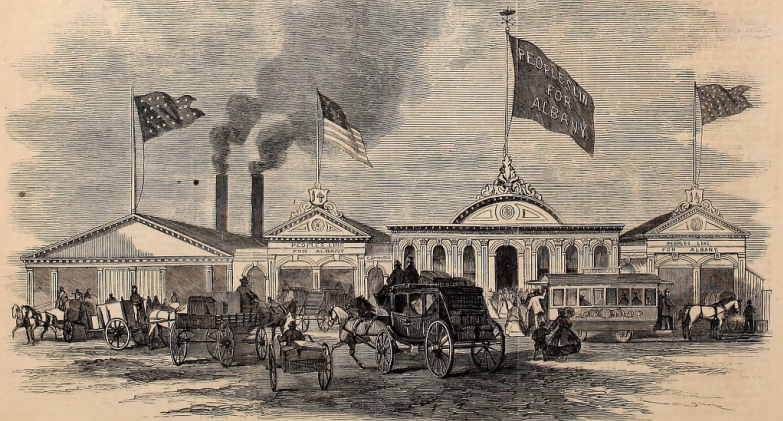
Only one steamer had half a mile to complete—that is to say, to ease the core with Mr. Walpole's most ingenious and elaborate machine of wire lines with apparatus to keep, when from the outer coverings. When all the distance were streamlined this was six feet, and the core passed through it with a steady velocity of a few of the machine, which, revolving at a great speed, coiled on the outer core of tarpaulin and hemp. The great portion of the cable had passed from the machine, and the end was held out by the aid of a rope, and in an electrical condition noted with a care and completeness that have certainly never yet been applied to any other cable, and from the time it left the machine it passed, in a series of the most searching electrical tests, the standard of which was fixed at a resistance of not more than a mile equal to 250,000,000 of Siemens units, at a temperature of 75 degrees Fahrenheit, a degree unprecedented in any former work of the kind. In addition to these tests, great as they were, have been considerably exceeded, and the present Atlantic cable has been successfully from centres of trials of the most crucial character.

Towards the outlook on Monday the last few fathoms of the great coil began to be drawn into the machine, and at the end of the day the end was in sight, with a splicing ball rung to give notice that the machine was about to stop, and at the same moment the men came down on the tank, and the last coil of the cable was shoved away. The cable was then coiled in tanks, and the process of the paying out apparatus, which has been already fixed up, and by means of an endless band, kept constantly running.

The present cable is just 2,300 nautical miles, or about 2,600 statute miles long. The coiled arrangement is composed of seven fine copper wires, twisted into one complete strand, which is insulated with Gutta-percha and Chatterton's patent compound. These wires are first covered in gutta-percha, each one insulated with the same material, and then twisted round the central wire. This gutta-percha again are wound 11 strand on wires, each of which is before being twisted on, as strand carefully wound round with strands of rope soaked with tar. It is stated very in three bullets, the first consists of 7 wires, the second of 10, and the third of 15 wires of 22. All the tanks are kept filled with water, and when each length is coiled down it is tested, and the ends spliced on, and a constant system of signals kept through every part from the moment the expedition starts till the end of the voyage is in sight. The weight of the tanks, with their contents, including the cable, is 5,000 tons. Two decks further will rise 30 feet with a carrying power of 10,000 tons.

A Mormon preacher said, "I have forty-eight children, and a week hence to hope that heaven will multiply me a good many more. Before a hundred years my direct descendants will exceed in number the population of the State of New York, which consists of four millions of souls."

REVIEW OF THE RETURNED VETERANS BY GOV. CURTIN—GEN. MEADE AND STAFF PASSING THE GRAND STAND, PENN. SQUARE, PHILA.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, F. H. [illegible]



DISPERSION OF KIRBY SMITH'S REBEL ARMY.

THERE was a great difference between the surrenders of Gen. Lee and Kirby Smith. The former surrendered his army to Gen. Grant, while the army under Kirby Smith dispersed itself, leaving the rebel leader no army. We give a sketch of the manner in which these remnant of the rebels broke up their military organization, and scattered to their homes and haunts. This renders Kirby Smith's order, dated Houston, May 30, very intelligible.

SOLDIERS—The day after I refused the demand of the Federal government to surrender this department, I left Shreveport for Houston. I ordered the Missouri, Arkansas and Louisiana troops to follow. My purpose was to concentrate the entire strength of the department, await negotiations, and if possible, secure terms alike honorable to soldier and citizen. Failing in this, I intended to struggle to the last, and with an army united in purpose, firm in resolve, and battling for the right, I believed that God would yet give us the victory. I reached here to find the Texas troops disbanded and hastening to their homes. They had forsaken their colors and commanders; had abandoned the cause for which we were struggling, and appropriated the public property to their personal use. Soldiers, I am left a commander without an army, a general without troops. You have made your choice. It was unwise and unpatriotic, but it is final. I pray you may not live to regret it. The enemy will now possess your country, and dictate his own laws. You have voluntarily destroyed your organization, and thrown away all means of resistance. Your present duty is plain. Return to your families. Resume the occupations of peace. Yield obedience to the laws. Labor to restore order. Strive both by counsel and example to give security to life and property. And may God in his mercy direct you aright and heal the wounds of our distracted country.

E. KIRBY SMITH, General.

The last news we have of this malignant rebel is that he has surrendered himself and the remains of his command to our forces, and awaits, a prisoner, the action of the authorities he has so long defied.

OFFICES OF THE PEOPLE'S LINE OF STEAMBOATS, WEST STREET, NEAR CANAL, NEW YORK.

GRAND MATCH BETWEEN THE ATHLETIC BASE BALL CLUB OF PHILADELPHIA, AND THE RESOLUTE CLUB OF BROOKLYN, N. Y., THURSDAY, JUNE 15TH, AT THE UNION GROUND, BROOKLYN.

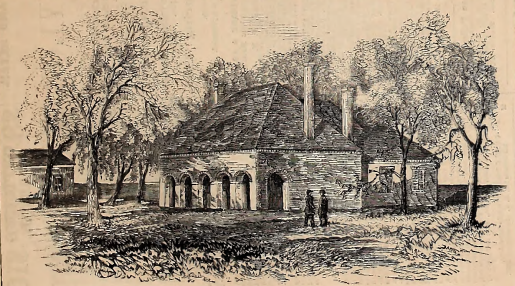
THE PEOPLE'S LINE OF STEAMBOATS.

We published in a former number of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, a correct picture of the new Albany steamer, the St. John, Capt. Peck. We here now to illustrate the new building erected by the Directors of the People's Line, situated in West street, near Canal. This enterprising company have widened West street over 50 feet, between Canal and Watts, and made a fine carriage way, 50 feet wide, upon their own premises—their whole arrangements are very elegant, as can be seen by our illustration.

The offices, store-rooms, passenger rooms, &c., extend from pier 39 to 41, these three piers have been entirely rooted in, and afford ample facilities for the immense business of this concern.

The general appearance of the buildings and docks is superior to anything along the water front of the city. The former are two stories in height, and display equal taste and convenience. Their dimensions are 70 feet by 93. They are painted outside in rich petroleum color, while the wood-work of the interior is oiled walnut, alternating with polished pine.

The next receiving pier is 450 feet long and 65 feet wide. The corresponding delivery pier is 300 feet long and 65 feet wide. These two wharves are for the accommodation of the Albany boats only, but as the company has bought up the steamers of the Troy line, it was necessary to fit up extra slips and docks for those vessels. The Troy pier, 39, is 300 feet long and 100 wide.

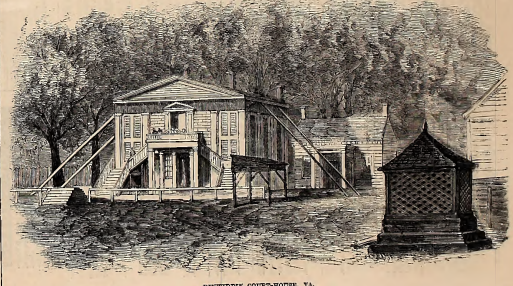


The slips between the piers are each 90 feet in width. The entire water front occupied by the company is 410 feet long, and the dock and slip area covers about 150,000 square feet.

The roofs over the piers are elevated between 20 and 30 feet from the floor. The cost of these improvements has been over $200,000.

The People's Line consists, at present, of the famous magnificent steamer St. John, Capt. Peck, the Hendrick Hudson, Capt. Roe, the C. Vanderbilt, Capt. Christopher, the Rip Van Winkle, Capt. Simmonds. Another boat, a companion to the St. John, is now nearly completed at the yard of John Englis & Son, the well known shipbuilders.

The People's Line is one of the oldest in the country, and is also one of the most popular. When the new boats is finished the capital will be over $2,000,000. Last year, with only two boats, it carried over 300,000 passengers.



Tickets for the People's Line are for sale at all the Central railroad ticket-offices in New York. The Company ships freight direct to any point east of the Rocky mountains, by rail, lake, river or canal, as the shipper may desire. All the boats have been thoroughly renovated and newly furnished this winter. The public will not fail to appreciate the enterprise which is directed toward heightening the comfort and pleasure of traveling without increasing the cost. Mr. Percy C. Smith continues to hold the office of New York agent of this splendid line, and to his attention to the public interests its success is largely due.

HANOVER COURT-HOUSE, VA.

HANOVER COURT-HOUSE, VA.

THIS building is an interesting relic of the "Old Dominion." It was built in 1735, more than 40 years before Virginia ceased to be an English colony. The fiery patriot and orator, Patrick Henry, was born within five miles of its walls and delivered one of his most stirring speeches under its roof Henry Clay, another o America's greatest ones, also came into the world within three miles of this venerable edifice. Our Artist visited the spot about a month after Sheridan's army evacuated the town. As a souvenir of his visit, he brought away with him a court summons, which commences: "George II., by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King," &c. This document is issued against Peter Ross, and summonses him to "appear before our justices of our said county court, at the court-house of the said county, on the third Monday in May next, then and there to answer the petition of John Threodgill exhibited against him." The summons is dated "the twenty-third day of April, 1760, in the XXXIIId year of our reign," and signed Geo. Nicholss. The ink with which the filling in is done is as fresh and bright as if it had been used yesterday.

To see a Britisher scalp a Britisher, says Sam Slick, talking of Parliamentary conflicts, is equal to a bull-fight, any time. "You don't keer whether the bull, or the horse, or the rider is killed, none of them is nothin' to you; so you can enjoy it, and hurrar for him that wins. I don't keer who carries the day, the valy of a treat of julep, but I want to see the sport. It's excitin', them things." As to killing, the more the merrier.

A PARLOR NOVEL.
MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.
BY MRS. GORE,

Author of "Castles in the Air," etc., etc.

"Another of Mrs. Gore's delightful productions—A Parlor Novel—just suited by its refinement and delicacy of sentiment, and its admirable life lessons, for the perusal of 'Mothers and Daughters.'"—London Examiner.

"Mrs. Gore combines moral instruction with pleasing and delightful romance. The present work is a chef d'œuvre—a book for our homes—full of charming sentiment and refined taste, and presenting a lively and agreeable picture of female character."—London Spectator.

"In her delineations of female character Mrs. Gore is peculiarly happy; but she was never more so than in the present instance. 'Mothers and Daughters' is one of the most fascinating novels of the day—a production that does honor alike to the principles and genius of the authoress."—London Athenæum.

IMPROVED
$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF PRACTICAL UTILITY AND EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is noiseless in operation, uses the straight needle, sews with Double on Single Thread. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity. Will Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Shirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c., &c.; requires no Lubrication or Change of Stitch—is not liable to get out of order, and will last a Lifetime.

"For the Dressmaker it is invaluable; for the Household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Ladies' Book.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Agents wanted everwhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

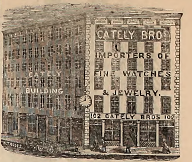
THE UNION CARDS

have already revolutionized the card trade, and still the work is only commenced. So great has been the demand for these Cards that the Company has scarcely been able to supply one grade, without attempting the manufacture of other qualities. By the increased facilities which have been added, through great expense, they are now prepared to fill all orders on the day received, and the cordial co-operation of all who love the Eagle, Shield, Stars and Flag of the Union is respectfully invited.

Of how much more significance are our Nationa Emblems than the homely, meaningless characters used to designate the suits in the old style of cards. Kings, Queens and Jacks are played out! Clubs and Spades no more!!



Colonels remove Kings; the Goddess of Liberty scorns Queens; and the Major is high to any Jack in Christendom. In order to secure your interest in the eneral circulation of the UNION CARDS, the following rices have been established, at which you will b supplied:

ARRANDALE & CO. Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 208 Broadway, NEW YORK.

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar Each!

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the Jewelry business, caused by the panic, which the war is bearing out of the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Watches, Jewelry, &c., have accumulated in the hands of the manufacturers, which must be sent off for sale in this country, and will be disposed of at ONE DOLLAR EACH.

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., notice that they have been appointed by the manufacturers, and have received upon a Great Gift Appointment to be sold without regard to value, for ONE DOLLAR EACH.

Certificates of the various articles are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and well mixed. They are then offered, at sixes and sevens, and sent by mail, or express, on receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to get, and then if to be had for ONE DOLLAR, pay the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any other of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

Send 25 Cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the certificate, paying postage and using the envelope, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the certificate is ordered. Certificates will be sent for 25 cts., 6 for $1; thirty for $5; and twelve for $10; and a splendid list of gifts.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and village in the country. Liberal terms to each will be allowed to canvass for orders. Agents can make from $100 to $200 per month, selling our goods at one dollar. Agents will obtain their goods at the rate of $10 per hundred (which is only 10 cents a piece), or one dozen for $1.

Address, for circulars, terms to agents, and Certificate of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT ENTERPRISE.—A new opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, jewellery, &c., at a low rate. ARRANDALE & CO., at No. 167 Broadway, They have made arrangements with the manufacturers to sell their entire stock, offered for $1 each. The distribution is certain to please purchasers, as it is by certificates, in certain amounts, enclosed in an envelope, and sent by mail to any address. Agents may realize a handsome profit. The article which will certainly be worth more than $1 will be sent, and that is all. This is an excellent mode this of obtaining a dollar.—Sunday Dispatch, New York, July 16, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been supposed to have been in a state of insolvency, but they are worthy of public confidence.—New York Sporting Life, Saturday, July 15, 1865.

We have received, at the office of Arrandale & Co's Great Gift Enterprise, a circular, stating that they have assortment of fashionable and valuable jewellery at the low price of one dollar each. We have not seen the articles, but understand that the whole of them are warranted to be as represented, and that the sale is principally for the purpose of introducing their goods to agents, who intend their services to sell their goods.—New York Evening Mail, July 15, 1865.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co.'s arrangement, the advantages are all on the side of the purchaser, and there is no carrying to gain and nothing comparatively to lose. Before you buy, you know what you are going to have, and as he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—Journal of Fashion, July 15, 1865.

Destitution, per Express.—The most eligible and profitable mode of obtaining a fortune is that offered in the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of jewellery, &c., now going on at Arrandale & Co.'s. The very accessible in this way, not only those who own stock in our own country, but the foreign holders to whom the sale of the certificates will be sent from our extensive exchanges with the principal cities of the world.—The New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1864.

In our columns to-day will be found the advertisement of Arrandale & Co's Gift Distribution of watches, jewellery and other articles. In payment of the advertisement we have several articles of the jewellery advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Lewistown), Aug. 17, 1864.

The British Army of Absolute, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by persistent solicitation obtained orders, and as prizes for the agents, she received a gold watch and chain. We can state that the articles were worth the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them ten times.

Schools of Practical Science.

GENERAL ROSECRANS is doing good service, through public addresses and letters to the press, in calling attention to the importance of establishing schools in all the states, in which the practical sciences shall be taught, and which shall be governed by military discipline. A double object, General Rosecrans conceives, would be secured through schools of this kind. They would open new avenues to wealth and honor by the application of science to agriculture, engineering, mining, metal working, and all the arts and trades, and would prove an inestimable blessing to many who would otherwise be crowded into the professions of law, medicine and theology, to pine and starve in penury, under all the incentives to dishonest practices which spring from it when associated with talent and disappointed ambition. Placed under military discipline, such military instruction would be conveyed in these schools as would qualify the pupils to be efficient officers of the militia, and capable of responding at once and intelligently to the calls of the country in case of danger.

"I would recommend," says General Rosecrans, "the establishment of schools of technology throughout the country, wherein our young men could learn the sciences and their application to agriculture, manufactures, and all the useful and ornamental arts and professions, so that the best and continually increasing lights of science might at once be brought to aid in developing the mighty resources of our young but giant country; that thus we should ennoble the minds of our youth, and direct their ambition into channels of peaceful, industrial progress, bringing honor to themselves and prosperity to the nation. The Emperor of Russia made Demidoff prince for his improvements in iron working, and I do not know why our great republic, or our free states, should be behind him in encouraging scientific industry."

The general is of opinion that the donation of proceeds of public lands lately made to the states by the general government for schools of agriculture and arts, might be applied in the foundation of such schools as he recommends, which should be under the control of the several states, as the military academy at West Point is under that of the nation. He suggests that there should be some free scholarships, and that as many paying scholars should be admitted as might choose to come.

There is no doubt that our collegiate system is a relic of monasticism, and fails to meet the requirements of the time. For most of the purposes of life, in a country like ours, the course of instruction in our colleges is utterly worthless. A few colleges have endeavored to graft a "scientific course" on the old middle-age system, but the trunk is rotten, and yields no sap to the uncongenial shoot. We need new

FRANK LESLIE'S

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold
Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received for it than for any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American Ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the age who have so distinguished themselves during our late rebellion.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Interesting Statistics.

THE WAR Department has issued a report of the military strength of the country for the past year. It contains some interesting and instructive statistics. In the first place the Adjutant-General carefully revises newspapers, that the Union armies were principally recruited from among emigrants, is effectively disproved by such evidence as that of 5,711 soldiers who died in hospitals in and around Washington, 4,010 were natives of the U. S.; 444 of Ireland; 306 of Germany; 142 of England; 40 of Scotland; 22 of France, and 17 of Wales.

Among the volunteers and conscripted men the proportion rejected on account of physical or mental disabilities was in the ratio of 23 in a thousand, or something less than 50 per cent. Statistics running over a series years show that the proportion in France has been 83, in Great Britain 337, and in Belgium 339 per thousand. In Maine the number rejected was higher than in any other state, being 43 in the thousand. The ratio was least in Wisconsin, namely 218 in the thousand.

The average height of the men entering the army from the various states was five feet six and one-third inches. Those from Michigan were tallest; those from Vermont next, &c., as shown in following table:

STATES.	Feet.	Inches.	Tenths.
Michigan	5	7	8
Vermont	5	7	6
Pennsylvania	5	7	5
Kentucky	5	7	4
New Hampshire	5	7	3
Massachusetts	5	7	2
New York	5	7	2
New Jersey	5	6	8
Delaware	5	6	7
Maryland	5	6	6
Minnesota	5	6	5
Ohio	5	6	0

In regard to rebel Vermont heads off Minnesota. Solomon Northup, Michigan coming third. The measurement at registration, and the states, stand as follows:

STATES.	Inches.	Hundredths.
Vermont	38	10
Minnesota	38	10
Michigan	38	03
Massachusetts	38	02
New York	38	01
New Jersey	38	00
Pennsylvania	37	99
Delaware	37	98
Maryland	37	97
Kentucky	37	93
Ohio	37	93
The average	38	10

At the close of the year the proportion of sick and wounded in the entire army was 6.3 per cent., a ratio of six strength, of which 3.3 per cent. were sick, and 6.4 wounded. This proportion is less than at the close of any preceding year, and shows that the sanitary measures adopted in the army were becoming more and more effective. Chronic diseases and diseases of the heart were the most prolific causes of the discharge of soldiers from the army.

THE process of "reconstruction" is going on. Provisional governors have been appointed in North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Texas, and the next step is to call the first meeting of the states, who are instructed and expected to establish civil governments for the following, and, "at the earliest practicable period prescribed by them, to cause to be elected by the qualified voters, composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people who are loyal to the United States, and no others, in the precise mode of altering or amending said constitutions, etc." No person, however, can exercise the privileges of voting or holding office in any of the states "who in any state laws as they existed before the rebellion, nor unless he takes the Amnesty oath. Such are the unending provisions of the several of the proclamations, providing provisional governments for the states lately in rebellion.

Here we have interwoven with these proclamations, my well look grave, for although they are couched in such paragraph that only loyal men, "and no others" shall have a voice in the organization of the several states, yet, in another place, it is provided that at the next state election and implicable, may convert the people into "loyal men" by taking the oath of Amnesty! Men who have refused to break their allegiance, men, and who have stood, musket in hand, in hostile array against the government for four years, will be allowed the obligation of the same oath from endeavoring to regain their lost power and carrying out the spirit of their treason in their respective states, although their delegations in Congress! It will be noticed further, that none can vote, except they enjoyed the right under the preexisting laws of the states in question. As some of these states gave the negroes this right, they will have no voice in determining the future condition of the states in which they live, and in which many of them have fought the battles of liberty so gallantly.

Disguise it we may, shut our eyes if we like, but the fact is, the proclamations of the President are but the means of reorganizing the power of the insurgents, strengthened, in consequence of the extension of the basis of representation by the enfranchisement of the slaves, to the extent of necessitas additional representatives in the halls of Congress! Does any one suppose that the blackskinned citizens will be slaves to their old lord to death more than eighty thousand of our brothers in dungeons and pestiferous prison-pens are to be murdered by the starvation of "loyal men," through the wondrous efficacy of the "Amnesty oath?" No man who knows a man, he defrauds the asylum for idiots while he remains outside its walls.

The bird may, those truly and demonstrably such, and who can be no other, are deprived of any voice in public affairs by the terms of the proclamation; that political annihilation is the worst sight of by the hallots of the Amnesty oath men, just as effectively as they were by the boycotts of the same men four years ago. To rebel these bayonets we were obliged to confront them with the bayonets of loyal black men; to resist their ballots is an even more necessary act, and one with the ballots of the same loyal black men. Otherwise, there can be no peace; we shall have a constant and embittered moral and political war, ready to break out, at the first favorable opportunity, in the form of a military revolt, a renewal of the agitation, and a repetition of the scenes which disturbed and shocked the country from 1861 to 1865, and which made a very Pandemonium of the national capital?

If so, we have only to "reconstruct" on the present basis. Let traitors revote you an outlaw; they will swear you twenty if you like, erase you with a sponge, and vote you down an hour after, wards—send up again their Toombses, Davises Keitts, Masons and Slidells, backed by seventeen more of the same prevalence, and thus you will see what "reconstruction" means under a scheme which only suspends perjury to treason in the qualifications of an elector. We have been told by President Johnson, that treason is the greatest of all crimes. The greater involves the less, and such a small encroachment on the conscience of a traitor as is involved in a false oath, will prevent none of Lee's, or Johnston's, or Taylor's, or Kirby Smith's men from renewing the war with bullets, now that bullets have failed.

THE new constitution "Missouri, now ratified by the people, makes the state free forever, establishes the equality…"all men before the law, and declares that Missouri must remain a member of the Union for ever. It excludes from the ballot-box and from office, traitors, rebels, rebel sympathizers, guerrilla marauders, bushwhackers, and their aiders and abettors. It in the like manner excludes Knights of the Golden Circle, Sons of Liberty and O. A. Is.

SENATOR SUMNER, of Ohio, in a recent speech, on the subject of the future condition concerning our national debt which will bear repetition, and which must interest all classes of readers. At the outset he remarked that our wealth was nearly doubles in every ten years and our population in every thirty years, so that every year the debt, although increasing, is to be paid off, however every year more diffused, and the per centage of burthen, whether on property or persons, diminished. The debt of the United States in 1816 was $127,000,000, or 14.67 per cent. on the total property of the people. Now the debt is $3,000,000,000 or 20 per cent. on the property of the loyal states, and we mean the South shall help us to pay it.

The very dollar of that former debt was paid in less than twenty years, and we were quarrelling about the proper mode of paying the debt of the present hands. In 1816 the debt of Great Britain was over $4,000,000,000, or $218.20 per head, 40-5-10 per cent. on the aggregate property of the empire. Now it is only 12 per cent of the property.

There are some incidental advantages of the present debt; it is a source of union extending to all classes of people; it is a convenient medium of exchange, a test of standard of the money market, a remedy in financial crises in France; it is a secure deposit for trust funds—widows, children, colleges and societies—heretofore endangered by the private securities pledged to guardians and trustees. By registering the debt the principal is beyond the danger of loss, and the interest promptly paid. A portion of it will form the basis and security of our national currency. The national banknotes are but another form of national debt.

WE read in the London journals, of the date of May 27th, "Mr. Lincoln's assassination our troubles over here," "have just commenced." Letters from "a trustworthy gentleman, just from the region beyond the Mississippi," and which reached England, conveying the important information that General Kirby Smith had "150,000 men on his muster-rolls," and that the rebellion was not yet crushed. It is admitted that the rebels in the east have met with some reverses, but the real business of fighting may now be said to be done when this unpublished Kirby Smith's 150,000 men in buckram had not only surrendered, but were scattered to their homes. As early as April 4, the rebel Governor Pendleton was shortly to make a little military promenade through Ohio, and Vallandigham, Morgan's friend, behind him a bushy-nose manifesto, complaining that his, according to the London newspaper correspondent, "large, well-disciplined and victorious army," had not only deserted him, but taken enthusiastically to the chivalrous business of freeing the negroes, and was marching, Sherman's Bay wall of disappointment, which is dated from Roanoke, the Texan capital:

"I trust you will find the Texan troops undaunted and hastening to their homes. They had treasonable intentions when they entered, but abandoned the cause of which were struggling, and appreciated the public blessings of peace. Gen. Wilcox, Texas, will be commander with our an army, a general without troops, and Gen. Magruder, Texas, will be governor of a population, but in fact, I pray you may not be to prove it. The people have returned to their allegiance, and take his own arms. You have voluntarily destroyed your military power, and have no longer the means of resistance. Your present duty is plain. Return to your families, resume the occupations of peace, and submit to all the laws. Labor to restore order. Strive, both by precept and example, to secure quiet and peace to the party. And may God in his mercy direct you aright, and heal the wounds of our distracted country."

THE government is sending men to the great battlefields of the west to have proper sepulture to the bones of the unburied dead. A body of 200 men, started lately for Chancellorsville and the Wilderness, to save some of skeletons have lain for so many months bleaching in the sun and storm. The pitying earth will soon shield these and relics from still greater indignities. A body of rebel rots over the bloody field of Chickamauga tells us:

"It was plainly evident where the rebel dead had been buried in the spring, the few of them that were granted that poor boon. The rebel soldiers but scratched a little sand over the gallop, and sometimes covered a foot or more. Of the spot marked by the rebel dead, there was not a vestige left, save a few rotten rags, and a bone or skull that even boys had not thrown about. Over the rebel dead lay the hard dirt of battle-field, and the dead were not even buried, one by one, as they fell, but were piled in rows, or in groups of two and three, upon the top of the ground, and then scraped over with a little earth over them. I do not suppose that one-half of our dead were buried, even in the slight, and hasty manner. I paid and exposed the extremities of bones. At one end of these little mounds lay a face skull, blackened by the sun, and at the other, two pairs of shoes full of bones, showing that there have also been feet. Here lay, wrapped in their blood-stained blankets, that no have been stabbed to take money. In one of these graves the wasps had built their nest. In another place lay a rebel in a row, by a little knapsack of tin, on which some soldier had perished, and remained unburied."

WE all remember the picture in Punch, of the American at a public table pointing a revolver at his neighbor opposite, and ejaculating fiercely, "I pass the salt!" The average Englishman, no doubt, believes that is the usual American way of asking for civilities. Sala, in his book about the United States paraphrases Punch. He says:

"If your next neighbor requires the salt-cellar, he extends his arm, points a grisly finger towards the blunderbuss dish, and in a scrubbed and utters the monosyllable 'say'—meaning, 'Give me that.'"

Sala, evidently, fell into congenial company. "Birds of a feather, etc."

THE distinguished French statesman and publicist, Count Montalembert, has written a very able and appreciative essay on "The Victory of the North in the United States." In response to his own question, "Ought we to bless God for this victory?" he answers:

"Yes! It is right to thank God, because a great nation has succeed best and, for ever punished, even if unjustly, by which gave to every enemy of liberty throughout the world a pretext for refusing it, because it did this moment passing all the hopes that were reposed in it, because we have freed ourselves, and all nations, from an execrable, triumphant and sated. Yes, it is right to thank God because that victory of slavery has been prepared under the word of the conquerors of Richmond, because it has been won from the very first moment, hand in hand together with Spain, we still intended by it the cause the most worthy of men to succeed for ever, and because, in the present time, upon the glorious continent of America shall be established, during the image of God, a new era of liberty, founded on the ruins of a given over, with his filth over his head, and his face in the dirt, to the cruel vengeance of the soldiers, who, in famous guise, or the vile passions of one of their officers. Yet it did not end. Because in this great and terrible struggle before an enviable and free people, there has not appeared wanting one which, although carrying ourselves has often been the victim of blunders and of errors, and has so often been calumniated, misled and dishonored by false friends and unswerving allegiance, has preserved, in the midst of every calamity of fortune which perforce open the eyes of all men to the truth and righteousness. Yes, it is right to thank God, because according to the most trustworthy testimony that we have heard, the moral and political causes has not been tarnished by any excuse, or stained by any crime; because its adversaries have no excuse to plead for its soldiers, no crimes to offer in their defence, no shelter for their cause, nor any guilt of having crowned base desires or wicked plots."

The Confederates had formerly been spoken of by an illustrious Frenchman as "an infant in swaddling clothes."

"Well," he replies, "it is now our work to cut this infant into pieces, and to consume it with fire, and that most quickly. This people, the subject of scorn, misfortune and calumny, has grown in a few years to be the most glorious nation which any nation could possibly pass, for which every one of every school of thought, intelligence and heart can look and glad to shake its old wishes and astounded the world with its prodigies. It is the most powerful, the most prosperous people of the world. Above all, we need to be ashamed of this people, and to be sorry on a new day, and at once whether valorous or conquered, it will fall a prey to some fortunate preparer, and will be ruined for ever by being a cultivator and ending being a despot; who will be called by the nations to whom we owe them, and encharge for saving them will demand what the Courts of Europe refused to us. Let us not forget this one point at least the experiment has been tried, and never was proclamation more stunningly united."

MR. CARPENTER, the artist who painted the picture of the Cabinet of the Emancipation proclamation, relates the following incident concerning Mr. Lincoln:

"Mr. Chase told me that, at a cabinet meeting, immediately after the battle of Antietam, and just prior to the issue of the September proclamation, the President uttered the following words, before them by saying that "the time for the emancipation of the emancipation policy of the government had arrived." The President, he thought, would establish—many of the warmest friends of the administration thought it, and he had promised it on the battle ground as it. The last part of this was uttered in a low tone, as if to himself, and he may or may not have intended that the cabinet should hear him. He asked the president if he correctly understood him, and Lincoln replied that he had. I asked him how he said that, if General Lee was driven back from Pennsylvania, he would issue his result by the declaration of freedom to the slaves!"

THE number of cannon found in the fortifications around Richmond is much greater than was anticipated. At the time four or five acres at the landing below Richmond were covered with cannon, caissons, army wagons, etc. Five vessels were set down in the James and Richmond, and, mingling with them, including the beautiful Whitworth battery of rifled cast-steel 12-pounders surrendered by the rebels at Danville, Va., which was presented to the rebels at the beginning of the war, by sympathizing friends in England. At Petersburg, just below its entrance, 40 heavy cannon were buried, and head-boards put up at each end, to remember soldiers' graves. The negroes, among them the 1st South Carolina, unearthed the treat, and upwards of 100 field pieces have already been exhumed. The amount of war material now accumulated by the government at both of its own armies and captured from the rebels, is almost incalculable. The rebel army was in a miserable way, an artillery officer lately intimated that the cannon, caissons, smithsmen, army wagons, etc., of the rebels were worse than those of a caravan reaching from New York to California.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Philadelphia paper states that Jeff. Davis appears to be already suffering the penalty of his crimes. His appetite has failed him, "liquid nourishment is with great power refuse to please him, and his days and nights pass on in wretched wakefulness. Those who saw him on Monday report that his eyes are sunken, his brow furrowed, his cheeks sunken, his eye lustless, meaning on that small walls of his face are a sweet horror before him and a pallid terror behind him.

His nerves are gone; he starts at the slightest noise like a fevered child; his physical organism is prostrated almost beyond recuperation. His apprehension, under consultation, proposed that the chamber-house quiet in his casement, and now the guards of the prisoner pace his cell in slippers, and their footfalls must give a sound. The prisoner never reads, never talks except to utter ejaculations of fear, and his last he indulges in much less frequently than he did.

DURING our war, when most of the productive interests of the country were paralyzed, by one of the singular coincidences which seem too pertinent for chance, petroleum came in when cotton failed to balance our exchanges with the world and may we not reverently believe that the unlocking of the exhaustless treasures which our rocks contain, when we are called to pay the immense cost of eradicating our great national sin, is the timely gift of an overwhelming power. Surely our history is showing that, with nations as individuals,

"There's a Divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them as we will."

The French empire still lives. It has survived the shock given to it by opening a penny subscription for a medal to Mrs. Lincoln.—We do not know if it was decided by a Consul of State or if the Emperor himself reached the momentous conclusion unaided, but it has nevertheless been decided that the subscription may go on. The empire is evidently regarded as strong enough to survive the ridicule aroused by a penny subscription for a medal, to be given to a widow in the West.

Some time in January last an advertisement appeared in a Sydney (Ala.) paper, headed, "One million of dollars wanted to have peace by the 1st of March." The advertiser proposed for the sum named to secure the lives of Abraham Lincoln, Wm. H. Seward and Andrew Johnson to be taken by the 1st of March then ensuing, and offered himself to contribute $10,000 towards the purpose. The person who inserted the advertisement is a lawyer of Selma named Gale. He has been arrested and is now confined in Washington. He is described as "a tall, raw-boned individual; coarse features, well bronzed with the Southern climate; he is dressed in light grey pants, butternut-colored coat, over which is a linen garment, and wears a wide-brimmed black slouch hat." Gale appears to be about 45 years of age, and his gray hawk-like eyes, with strongly-marked crow-feet in their corners, give him the appearance of a shrewd, cold-blooded rascal."

The London Herald speaks as follows of the colored statue of "Isaac" under the influence of the evil spirit," by Mr. Story, of Boston, now in the Dublin International Exhibition:

"This is a great work, the fruit of many years' thought, culminating in a happy inspiration. Mostly, even among angry passers in the hands of Satan, and yet knowing that he ought to struggle against his conscience, with averted face, but inch-meter eyes and quivering cruelty rising from his nethermost heart, still Satan, standing at the back of the most malignant sneer, and affording material for study to one who cares to look at him, is the great Tempter. Another effort which, I believe, by Mr. Story, is grand. It is Judith, the daughter of Jephthah, lamenting unconsolably."

Gerrit Smith is thrown upon the early New-Englanders in these days because they hanged witches and banished Quakers. Inexplicable as their conduct may appear to us, yet it was only a mistaken reflection, after all, of the ideas and prejudices prevalent in Europe in those days. Five hundred people are said to have been executed as witches in three months of 1515. More than a thousand were burnt within a year in the district of Como; and one of the most learned witch-finders died of having himself sentenced to death 500 persons within 15 years. The first English statute upon witchcraft appears to have been in 1541, when two Acts of Parliament were passed. The preamble alone, however, did not become frequent until the accession of James, although we are told that Queen Elizabeth's toothache was the effect either of witchcraft or of some natural cause. Witches might be arrested on simple rumor. A fit, a shock or a heretic (the worst criminals in the eye of ecclesiastical authority) might be given evidence by wives might hear witness against each other. The advocate, if he defended his client beyond what was necessary, was to be himself considered guilty as a patron of witches and heretics. These provisions would be enough to make a conviction certain by ordinary rules; but in witch cases the burden of torture remained. If the wretched witch did not confess, it was because the devil made his servant insensible to pain. In order to extort a confession from obdurate persons, their lives might be promised to them, and the promise might afterwards be broken. Torture was not to be continued without fresh evidence, but it might be repeated according to judgment. In short, it seems that anybody might be accused of witchcraft, and thereupon tortured at discretion and afterwards burnt at the stake.

A society has recently been formed in Paris, the object of which is to publish rare works on ancient history and archæology. The early Spanish expeditions, and the organization of the various colonies, will be fully illustrated in a series of volumes, and, in the meanwhile, the society has thought that it could not do better than to commence the series by the publication in a cheap form of the letter of Christopher Columbus on the discovery of the New World. This document is the earliest relating to America with which we are at present acquainted. A Latin translation of it was printed in 1493, Italian and German versions speedily followed, and now M. Leon de Rosny presents it to us in a French dress. The editor explains in the preface what were the relations of Columbus; his scientific theories, no thought of discovering a new world, ever entered into his head. He wanted merely to find another road to India, instead of that which travelers followed by Egypt and the Red Sea. For that reason he designated by the name of India the country where he landed; on his arrival at Cuba he believed himself to be in India, and was surprised at not meeting with the Khan of Tartary. Political conquest, commercial enterprise, and religious proselytism were the three leading motives which guided the Genoese admiral, and from this point of view the brochure published by M. de Rosny is extremely interesting. Copious notes have been added, all borrowed from original sources.

The London Saturday Review tells us, with an emphasis too well justified by the truth, that "the essence of American humor lies in that habitual strain of exaggeration which is for ever clothing the ridiculous in the language of the sublime. Whether in journalism or in stump oratory, that which seems to form the highest standard of national taste is what is popularly known as 'tall talk,' or the 'high falutin' style.

NEW MUSIC.

THE BOYS ARE MARCHING HOME.—THE PEACH JUBILEE.—GLORY TO GOD IN THE HIGHEST. New York: Horace Waters.

The first of these is "new in every sense," the spirited music-publisher named above is anticipating the wishes of the million, by presenting, in this number, the Hymn and its Tenors, in time for the celebration of the next glorious 4th of July, which will see a grander hope once more united. Both the words and music cannot fail to please the popular ear and taste.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE news from Europe is not of much importance, but we may mention that Lord Brougham, at a dinner given to the Prince of Wales, at Edinburgh's Hall, after passing a high eulogium on President Johnson, when he said was admirably fitted to succeed the past and merciful ruler, Abraham Lincoln, hoped his wise counsels would prevail over the clamor and commercial mercy to the rebel chiefs.

Lord Clarence Paget, in responding to a toast of "The Navy," raised much merriment by the remark that invited the English armor-plated fleet to make a tour around the world, to show that it is invincible. The noble Lord fancied he had been asked to make a similar tour around the English coast. The Prince of Wales was present, and at Ryswick together about the middle of July. It is reported that the Prince of Wales will probably review the fleet at Plymouth, and at Spithead previous to Cherbourg.

The Fenian raps Parliament will probably be dissolved on the 10th of July.

The Morning Post denies the rumor that Lord Palmerston is about to resign public life.

The Great Eastern will probably sail from the Nore on the 8th of July, and from Plymouth on the 10th or 11th.

The London Times says that Gen. Rollin, the special envoy of the Emperor Maximilian, had arrived in Paris from Vienna, where, it is said, with the aid of King Leopold, he succeeded in negotiating a loan of 200,000,000 francs to reinstate his brother Maximilian in all his agnatic rights, in the event of his returning to Austria.

TOWN SCUDS.

THE great topic of the past week has been the intensely warm weather, which has woefully interfered with the usual amusements of the season, and kept by the sentiment and the young. It has also been a perpetual theme of hot lectures on the prominence of the cuticle, and numerous prescriptions for the prevention of sun-stroke on that point. Apropos of porosity, the Chinese Review has a curious statement in relation to that subject. An Irish philosophy of our acquaintance stunningly illustrates the fact of porosity in a single. It must be porous the other, and that, consequently, it is easy to drown a man by immersing him in water, although not so deep as to cover his mouth. The Chinese, however, in such warm weather, on such a subject, it is alleged that you can drown a man by immersing him in a tub of liquor, more especially if the liquor be made warm. A slight elevation of spirits may therefore be induced by immersing the feet, &c.

But we will languidly drop this subject, and observe that it is said that the rebel chiefs are not to be executed for the sake of health or for the sake of fashion, that mercenary consideration which has such influence, the best society, the opera, and every other mundane enjoyment, to give existence that zest which is par excellence life.

What but the highest enthusiasm in the cause of republican freedom could bring a Polish refugee from house to Fourteenth street, and live in the back of it for the sake of being near to the Union? Their fertility of notion, and the still more bending inducement of a living, is the fact that the Polish Hotel is "Kosciusko at Saratoga."

There is an advantage of going out of town in, that it rubs a little of the rust off a man. It also affords the very reverse of a rest to the mind, and therefore is a positive advantage. We are, consequently, informed by a young lady, a Cherokee of the Far West, that she is at home and at ease with the Indian question, and that the Indian as an ancient settler has no claim to be that which he is, and that the young lady has really undertaken to pay the board of a young lady, who is a native of the soil, and who is most comfortable up among good browns, by the little effort she has to make in order to get rid of her previous incumbrance. It is of life are the same now, when gold is 141, as when it was 100. It is very much the same thing as to the abstain from beef for one week, or from butter for one week, in order to relieve the poor. The consumption of the best-eaters and the butter-eaters unanimous. Both the butter and the beef are unanimous in the confession declared there were so many, that if they had been unanimous they would have carried him downstairs.

As farm as the weather has been, it has not been too warm for a very pretty little military review of the 2nd Division of the National Guard, which took place on Thursday. This affair came off at the armory in 14th street, and did great credit to the officers and men. Among the many causes "whose bright eyes rain influence and sighed every maiden's heart," was the presence of Miss Hattie M. Carr, a rosy-cheeked young lady, from the Emerald Isle, who, it is said, is the belle of the season. We presume it is on the principle of media medicina, that a touch of Hibernian is the best cure for the many recklessness of sieges.

Among the guests the general was serenaded at the Metropolitan Hotel, and, during the evening, Tilda saluted the gallant military men to become orators, stating every man to be a soldier, and every soldier, a public-talking national spirit, considering what it has done. Gen. Sickles was called upon, and, after a brief allusion to the days of Julius Cæsar and the result that many of his generals were found to quarrel with his success and finally to be assassinated, concluded with a few remarks upon the necessity of a standing army, and the duty of the militia to defend it.

Despite the warm weather there have been found several thousands of the salamander race to visit the theatres.

Barnum's, as usual, has been comparatively crowded, but not angelically so, that is to Mark's Patent Ventilator, which dispenses 10,000 feet of pure cool air every minute. The new work of Maddison Morton, or the Belle of the Faubourg," Barnum, like Wallack, understands management; and economy has been with him for years, and they know how to play into each others hands: hence all his dramas are well played, while the agreeable novelty of a star comes upon this well ordered scene like a beautiful fairy ship crowning the wave. There are two windows now on view and well worth a visit.

Mrs. Watkins has been charming her old friends at the Broadway, while Margie Mitchell at Niblo's, Miss Hosmer at the Winter Garden, and Wallack and company, at Wallack's Theatre, offer a choice of summer meats not often seen in one city.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—In Nevada City, Montana, flour rose one day recently, from $25 to $125 per 100 pounds. A "Grand Consolidated Gathering" is an imposition, formed a club, sensed what they required, and paid for it at the rate of $22 per 100 pounds.

Kirby Smith carries to Mexico, according to the Natchez Courier, $7,000,000 in specie. With this sum he ought to be able to buy out the bankrupt Maximilian, and have his place as the Emperor Napoleon's agent to extend the influence of "the great Latin race" on this continent.

The Secretary of State is issuing passports at the rate of 1,000 a month—some of which come on American soil, and are duly registered as No. 26.

The heat in one portion of California are having a very bad effect upon the rebel Vallejo. Wine, once in a government military ground, and the fancy of heavy contributions upon the Indians, are missed.

Connecticut has furnished 54,408 men during the war.

Goldwin Smith begins an article with the remark that in the city of New York, "America has produced the one mere ideal character, the most precious and inspiring of national possessions."

The rebel Lord Beauchamp having returned from the rebel army, the old man asked him in his quaint way, "Well, my lord, have you seen what you have been fighting for?" "Yes, father, we have been trying to force our slaves into freedom."

The Kansas City (Mo.) Journal says that peace reigns unbroken on the plains. The Indian hatchets have given up their inhuman business; the roads are safe for travel, and the farmers are restoring the waste places and putting in large crops.

The Legislature adopts by a large majority Senator Sumner's resolution in favor of the Chicago Republican says: "Mr. Lincoln has written a letter to the National Union convention, declining their nomination. Before the document was arched over the President's remains at the White House, it was read by Mr. Lincoln. Not to which it was to be placed, she would accept a proposition for the removal of the body to the legislature."

The watchfull room by the ladies is not without its uses. During the excitement of the fire, Mrs. Hamilton, a lady connected her jewelry and $1,000 in money in her hair, and then saved it to herself and husband.

The government undertaker at Nashville, since the federal occupation, has buried "the wife of one federal soldier and employer; also about 8,000 rebel soldiers and citizens, and 1,000 negroes."

The Raleigh Record says that in 1860 the population of the State was 992,622 whites, 361,522 free colored persons and 331,059 slaves, and that in 20 of the counter in the first district, 1,000 votes were cast for the whites, and that if negro suffrage is allowed, 54 votes would be cast for the blacks to the legislature.

The estate of our late President Lincoln is officially returned by Judge Davis, his friend and executor, as of the value of $75,000.

Bishop Andrews, of the M. E. Church, South, has issued a pastoral letter to the connexion advocating and a peaceful acquiescence in the new order of things.

The Treasury has resolved on cutting down expenses to the lowest point. He is known to favor reimbursement to the loyal men of the South of taxes which he will recommend to Congress. It is expected that the army will be reduced to 100,000 men by the new year.

Penn 17th, Edmund Ruffin, who achieved an unenviable notoriety by firing the first gun gun at Fort Sumter, committed suicide at his residence, near Petersburg upon the Richmond and Danville railroad. He intended to be present at the capture of Richmond, and taking a seat in a chair, took a gun, seated with also in the muzzle, and with his foot on the trigger, discharged the piece by pushing the trigger with a stick. He was found dead in the sitting room of his house. In a diary of his was found a memorandum stating that the social system of the United States must be overthrown, and took death in preference. In the same memorandum he said he would not survive the defeat of the South on the 4th of April (the day Gen. Lee surrendered) but that he would live to see the restoration of the Confederacy.

Havana advices of June 17th announce the arrival on the 8th of the U. S. steamer Tuscarora, Capt. Wilson (aid-de-camp to Jeff. Davis), and Gen. Slaughter. His party will proceed to Mexico to accept from the Emperor court in an open boat. They landed at Cardenas, whence they will go by land to Batabano, and thence by steamer to Belize. He was treated with great attention by the officer.

The Court of Appeals has declared that the new Constitution of Virginia abolishing the county courts of corporates are to be disbanded. The recent riot at Lynchburg was the result of the necessity of the claim to about be carried into effect.

Fort's Theatre, at Washington, the scene of the assassination of President Lincoln, has been sold to the Young Men's Christian Association for $25,000.

The Rebel Generals and Colonels of Augusta, Ga., announce that if any of their subscribers prefer to pay their subscriptions in anything in preference to gold, they are willing on these terms! Incom. 10 cents a bushel for corn, 25 cents a bushel for wheat, and 50 cents a flour, 5 cents a pound.

Saturday, June 30th, there was a very severe riot at Flushing, on the occasion of some private excursion parties returning from the sea. It is said that several were killed, and over 40 wounded.

Fire in Chicago.—There was quite a patherine of people on Saturday, June 30, at North Avenue, to witness the burning of the mansion of Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick's. The bridesmaid was Miss Hattie M. Carr, of Chicago, who took her place. After the ceremony a reception was given to the bridal party at the residence of Mr. Hedges, who was assisted by her charming daughter alma.

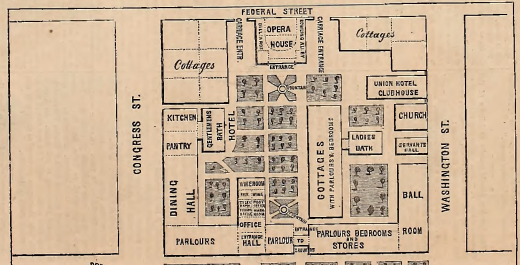
SONGS FOR ALL SEASONS.—We have received a very beautiful little book, illustrated, published by Richard & Dublin, Boston, entitled "Songs for all Seasons," by Alfred Tennyson.

There are not that the time devoted to pastime is unproductive of good results; for, if well chosen, it proves a medium for exercising imaginative powers, diverting the mind, and often conveying deeper impressions than the reading a sound chapter of reading on such subjects would do.

FRONT VIEW OF THE UNION HOTEL, BROADWAY, SARATOGA, N. Y., AS RECENTLY ENLARGED BY THE PROPRIETORS, LELAND BROTHERS.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. ALBERT BERGHAUS.



UNION HOTEL AT SARATOGA.

Of one many summer resorts—all of them delightful in their way—Saratoga may be considered the crême de la crême—the Baden of America. Next in importance to the Springs, so celebrated all over the world, is the great Union Hotel, hardly less celebrated, of which the Messrs. Lelands are proprietors. Under the enterprising management of those gentlemen, the Union Hotel has become one of the institutions of the land, and may be considered fairly to contrival the celebrated Hotel de Louvre, in Paris. An idea of the immensity of the establishment may be formed from the fact that it covers an area of about seven acres, and was built and stocked at a cost of more than half a million of dollars. The following is a brief history of the hotel and its appurtenants: In the spring 1865 the Messrs. Lelands purchased the Putnam and Payne property, known as Union Hall property, for $300,000, and also a block of lots for the purpose of obtaining fresh spring water. Last spring they purchased the Ainsworth property (the north wing), corner of Broadway and Washington street, for $120,000, the Washington Putnam property, for extending the grounds and for a few houses, for $20,000; for the Gold spring, with lying necessary pipe, $7,000; and six lots for enlarging the barns, $6,500. They have erected two substantial brick building, 30 by 80 feet, four stories high, French slate roof—for plunge, shower, hot and cold-water baths—at an expense of $40,000; have extended the dining-room on Congress street, five stories high, 70 by 80 feet, after the style of the Tuileries of Paris, at an expense of $40,000, and built an opera-house, with a capacity for accommodating 1,500 persons, at an expense of $60,000.

As an evidence of the expenditures on the inside of the building, it is only necessary to say that the bills for carpets, silverware and crockery alone, amounted to $46,000.

The dining-room proper, of the Union, with wide and airy spaces through the hall and between the tables, accommodates 1,000 persons, while by the addition of the north piazza, expressly designed as an auxiliary, the dining-room capacity is increased to 1,400. The number of rooms of the Union—most of them spacious, and many of them in suits for the accommodation of families—is 797; of which 250 have been added by the Lelands.

The buildings, surrounded by a beautiful park, which is shaded with elm trees (some of which have, at full growth, been recently transplanted upon the grounds), are to be illuminated with gas.

The first great event of the season at the Union, will be the grand military ball of July 4th, which will be attended by scores of distinguished characters, among them Gen. Grant, it is said.

FIRE AT NASHVILLE.

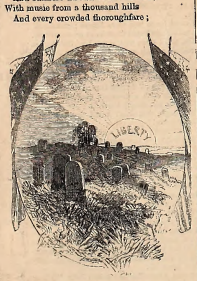
At two o'clock P.M., on the 9th inst., Nashville was visited by one of the most destructive conflagrations that ever occurred in that city. The flames were first discovered proceeding from the south half of the immense government building, known as Taylor's depot, on Summer street, below Broad, and in less than three hours the entire structure, and its contents, amounting to about $4,000,000 worth of quarter-master's stores, was destroyed. The origin of the fire is not known; some attribute it to sparks ejected from a locomotive, others to the work of an incendiary. The consternation of the populace congregated in the vicinity of the conflagration, is said to have been beyond description. The heat was so great that the firemen could not stand within 100 feet of the building.

The following, which is but a partial list of the property destroyed, will convey some idea of the extent of the damage done by the fire:

In the list of the building there were 800,000 pounds of wagon grease, 100 barrels of tar, 10,000 pounds of oakum, and 300 bales of oakum, 200 pounds of rosin, 20,000 pounds of pitch about 7,000 pounds of harness' grease, 1,000 wheelbarrows, 3,000 water-buckets, 500 sets of blacksmiths' tools, 300 anvils, 200 bellows, 300 portable forges, 300 vices, an immense amount of running gear for wagons, and 4 600 heating stoves.

On the first floor there were 75,000 pounds of harness leather, 60,000 kegs of horse-shoe and cut nails, 6,000 boxes of sheet tin, 25,000 pounds of iron washers, 25,000 pounds of rope, 2,000 pounds of paint, 20,000 feet of lead pipes, 2,500 gallons of mannfoot oil, 2,000 pounds of bridle leather, 15,000 feet of belting, 200 circular saws, 7,000 picks and handles, 3,000 lanterns, 12,000 files, 2,500 hay-forks, 13,000 axes and handles, 10,000 augurs, about 300 chests of valuable horse medicines, 6,000 wagon covers, 3,000 sets of harness, 3,000 horse-brushes, 4,000 jockey whips, 11,000 neck-straps, 5,000 halter-chains, 3,500 bridle bits, 2,000 wagon spokes, and an immense quantity of boxes containing glass.

A JERSEY man was lately arrested for flogging a woman, and excused the act by saying he was near-sighted, and thought it was his wife!



GROUNDS OF THE UNION HOTEL, SARATOGA, N. Y., SHOWING THE NEW OPERA-HOUSE, BATH-HOUSES, ETC.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. ALBERT BERGHAUS.

FOR THE NATION'S BIRTHDAY.

July 4th, 1865.

BY EBEN E. REXFORD.

WITH roar of guns, and clang of bells,
And banners thrown to kiss the air,
With music from a thousand hills
And every crowded thoroughfare;

With hearts that chant the jubilee,
Alight with freedom's holy ray,
We sing the anthem of the free,
And usher in our natal day.

We hear the cannon's thund'rous roar,
As from some Southern battle plain;
Thank God! our battle days are o'er,
We hope to never come again.
We lift our eyes toward the sky
And see the flag our father's gave,
And think how sweet 'twould be to die
Where'er its grand old folds could wave.

We think of all—the night of war,
Our flag's disgrace, our nation's pain,
And look toward the Union star,
Whose light shall not be dimmed again.
And through the values of our souls,
We feel a thankful, grateful joy;
But ah! a shadow backward rolls,
Our gladness has a dark alloy.

Where are the heroes, true and tried,
Who went to freedom's battle forth?
Hark to the answer—they have died
As die the heroes of the north;
Some on the blood-red battle plain,
Where cannons rang their funeral knell,
And some with sickness' lingering pain,
Have hid the world and life farewell,
And they are heroes—every one—
No matter where their graves are made;
The warfare of their life is done;
Where'er a soldier's form is laid,
The springs, through coming peaceful years,
Shall bend to kiss the sacred sod—
The skies shall drop their tender'st tears,
O'er those who died for right and God.

Ah! many a heart will ache to-day,
And many an eye grow dim with tears,
As down the future's lonesome way
They look upon the shadowed years.
Oh! weeping mothers of the North,
Oh! wives who miss your husband's kiss,
'Twas God who called your loved ones forth;
Look up and see His hand in this.
Fling out thy folds to greet the sky,
Oh! grandest flag the world e'er knew,
For thee the nation's heroes die,
For thee have died the tried and true
The blot that dimmed thy hues, is gone;
From out the red baptismal flood
Arise, new-born, at freedom's dawn,
Thy stain is washed away in blood.

THE PRAIRIE GIRLS' DUEL.

BY MRS. LILLIE DEVEREAUX UMPSTEAD.

OUT on the prairies, almost west of sundown, was a little settlement. Far around it, stretched miles and miles of wild country, primeval forests, unexplored hills and vast plains, seemingly boundless as the ocean, and quite as trackless. It stood nearly under the shadow of the Rocky Mountains, a last outpost of civilization between the Missouri and the Pacific.

Life in this frontier village was not the effeminate existence of an eastern city, where every pleasure is enervating, and the only excitement that of money-making, but a stirring episode, in which each day was crowded with incident, while the constant presence of danger lent a zest to any amusement, and a wild delight to the pursuit of the hunt or the chase. Here any man's house was built, not for display but for safety, so that each one was a little citadel well stored with arms, for here various terrors constantly threatened the settlers. Treated Indians, whose land they subdued, might at any time attack them, to seek, in a frightful massacre, revenge for their forefathers' wrongs; from the mountains, prowling bears watched for the lives of any who strayed far and alone, and all night the long howl of the wolves warned them of the perpetual vicinity of a deadly foe.

In such a community, where men and women alike were inured to hardships, and accustomed to danger, the young girls were more hardy than most young men at the east. Here were none of the delicate belles with fair complexions and delicate hands, to whom every exertion is a weariness and labor an impossibility, but a race of stalwart damsels, broad-shouldered and firmly knit in frame, with eyes as bright as a mountain eagle's, skins that were bronzed with sun and wind, and hands that could manage a rifle better than a parasol.

Among those who most excelled in all employments which we should call masculine, were the two rival belles of Rocktown, as this village was called. Aurora Field was the only child of a widowed mother; her father had died very soon after he brought his young wife to this western settlement, and for many years Mrs. Field had found it a hard and desperate struggle to support her young child and herself; but from the time Aurora grew up all this was changed. She early showed a passionate ambition to learn to excel in all the parents by which the settlers earned a living, and her persistent perseverance, joined to great natural ability, before long crowned her efforts with success. At twenty she had, by her own exertions, been enabled to build a cottage for her mother and herself. Her garden was the best and most productive in the village; the wheat in her fields seemed greener than in any others; but best of all, Aurora was as skilful a hunter as any in Rocktown. Yes, this young girl had the heart of a lion's mane in her virgin breast, and the stories of her prowess in the chase were the favorite theme of her mother. The rooms of her little cottage were adorned with the spreading antlers of the deer she had shot, and the packet of furs she sold to the traders every spring, were most of them the spoils of her dexterity and ingenuity. This young amazon stood a good five feet six, with a figure as faultless as Diana's, "iron-jointed and supple-sinewed." Her face was very handsome, for under the brown skin the rich blood flushed out in the roses of youth and health, her dark eyes flashed with the laughing light of good nature and quick intelligence, and her chestnut hair hung in thick, unbraided curls, that had never known hairpin or tucking comb, but were kept trimmed for neatness and convenience, so that they adorned her well-shaped head like a flowing coronet.

Julia Dalton, the rival queen, was the daughter of the wealthiest settler in Rocktown. With her no necessity had urged to learn the use of a rifle or how to manage a restive horse, but a natural desire for superiority, which in her ambitious spirit made it hard to endure a rival or acknowledge a better. She was the spoiled child of her father's heart, and he had taken great pains to teach her to excel in all the hardy sports of the village, so that as a matter of pride she was the best rider, the swiftest horse, and pull a better oar on the turbid river, than any other girl in Rocktown but Aurora Field; here she was forced to own an equal, and in some respects a superior. Never yet had Julia outdone Aurora in anything; many times, when pitted against each other, their success had been alike, but more than once Aurora had come out the victor, and while Julia could forgive, she could hardly she grew to hate with a desperate dislike this girl who, in the midst of her triumphs, was always so amiable, coming back a laughing word to every annoying word, and generally offering to share the fruits of her prowess with her defeated antagonist. Julia knew, too, that Aurora was far more of a favorite then she; her frank manners, and the delicate tact in that was always looming around her pretty mouth and dimpling up her cheek, made her more popular than Julia's more reserved address, and yet, perhaps, the latter was strictly speaking, the handsomer of the two. She was an inch taller than Aurora, and her figure was more elegant, for she had not yet outgrown girlhood. Her face was a faultless oval, with features more regularly harmonious than Aurora could boast; her complexion was dark, but from every cheek but a clear olive naturally; her hair, as black as night, was coiled around her head in lustrous masses, and her large black eyes were sparkling in combe color and length of shading lash.

There was one point in which Julia was incontestably superior to Aurora, and that was in education. She had been away from home for two years at a boarding-school, and had acquired a fair average education, while Aurora's literary accomplishments amounted to nothing more than knowing how to read, and being able to keep her accounts. But at this sort of attainment Aurora only laughed; she cared little enough for what she called such nonsense, and was quite content that Julia should know more of history, or geography, than she did, provided she could beat her at riding or rowing, and at shargeshooting.

Of course the two girls had each of them suitors enough. Julia's small mirror and her own high mind made desperate work with the hearts of half-a-dozen young men, and Julia's extraordinary beauty, joined to her accomplishments, had made her some of the best offers that Rocktown or even some of the nearest frontier towns could boast. Thus far no young lady seemed to have any charm in the least impressed by any of her admirers. It is true that Aurora gave some encouragement to the devotions of Hugh Wallace, the most elegant young hunter in Rocktown, but thus far he had been unable to draw her an assurance that his hopes would one day be crowned with success. And yet it seemed a strange that Aurora could resist him. For he was handsome enough to turn with fearless gray eyes, and thick, curling, dark hair and beard, standing a clear six feet three in his stockings, erect and finely proportioned was his figure. But up to this time Aurora had only laughed at him when he had urged her to promise to be his wife, and told him that she did like the confidence too well, to give it up for any man.

And now, dear reader, to introduce my favorite pair some, I will proceed to relate my story, always premising that these prairie girls are not to be judged by the standard we should apply to our city ladies.

One day Aurora and Julia had a famous race on the prairie. Of late the dislike between them had grown so great that they rarely met where they could avoid it, and this cmulty sprang up, it must be confessed, principally from Julia. Aurora knew she did not like her, but she would not have cared much for this, had it not been that she found Julia's manner gradually growing so disagreeable that, in self-defence, she thought it best to keep out of her way. But this afternoon accident brought about a meeting. Aurora had been out for a day of grouse-shooting on the prairies, when just after she had commanded her horse to ride home, she encountered Julia. Aurora looked the handsomer in dress and equipment. She wore a short dress of dark green cloth, and full wide trousers, her ordinary costume being in this style, for in Rocktown bloomers were the rule and not the exception, and long skirts would have been absurd in the sort of life she lead. She had stout boots on her well shaped feet, and heavy gauntlets on her fine-knit hands; on her head she wore a round cap that suited admirably her pretty face and dimpling curls. The only speck of coquetry in her toilette was in the scarlet bow that properly confined her neat white collar. She rode a strongly-built Mustang pony, and had her bag of game in front of her, her powder-flask and shot-pouch in her belt, and her rifle slung at her back, looked a veritable young Nimrod.

Julia's dress was much more in accordance with the notions of propriety it was a well made habit, with long skirts, a rolling hat adorned with black feathers, and quite a stylish standing collar and cravat. She was mounted on the handsomest bay horse in her father's stables.

Aurora was trotting down the road towards Rocktown, whistling merrily, when she encountered her rival.

"Good afternoon, Julia," she cried, with a little friendly nod.

Julia responded with a cold bow, and then, as Aurora was in the same direction for a little, she added pleasantly:

"Nice afternoon for a ride, isn't it?"

"Yes, Miss Aurora," said Julia, "but your horse is pretty well used-up by a day's work I suppose."

"Not a bit of it—fresh as a lark; he's been tied up pretty much all day long, while you been walking the prairies for grouse."

"I heard the other day that you and your mustang could beat the best horse I owned."

"So I did," replied Aurora, with a little allowance of censure.

"Well, I believe this is about as good a horse as I have—are you afraid to try?"

"No, Miss Dalton, you know I'm not afraid of anything," returned Aurora, with her eyes flashing; "although my pony can't near the size of your horse, he's a better built horse than he, and will beat yours all to pieces."

"We'll see," said Julia, with her teeth set. "It's five miles from here to the river, let's see who'll be there first."

"Agreed!" cried Aurora, without more words the two girls turned their horses, and started like the wind down the road. Julia had a little the advantage in the start, Aurora's pony would not go at once after her, but as they dashed down the prairie path she urged on her little mustang with so much spirit that she soon regained the distance and was neck and neck with her antagonist; for some distance the girls rode on in silence, their horses, never looking right or left, but flying along like two rival nymphs of Diana. But the contest was not to be decided by speed of foot. Aurora began to have a misgiving that all was not right with her pony, and had not taken her from defeat before the end of the five miles, when, as they dashed past a little clump of trees that grew on the bank of the river, Aurora was caught what seemed to be a faint groan.

Instantly she slackened rein; careless of the result of the race, she drew up her pony and listened. Yes, that was surely a human groan, and Aurora turned her pony to a halt. Julia, for a moment, thought she had really beaten her rival defeated, but in an instant glancing around she saw what had occasioned it.

"Ah, ha!" she laughed. "You have stopped; you are beat!"

But Aurora did cried Aurora, impatiently, "but don't you hear? there is some one groaning here."

Julia instantly rode back to the copse where Aurora had paused, forgetting her enmity. She drew up her horse almost as soon as Aurora, and the two entered the bushes together. Both had, for the moment, laid aside all dislike, and were united in the common humanity.

A little, search and distressing the sound of the groans, they soon came to the sufferer. It was a boy of ten or twelve years, apparently, in appearance. He was young and handsome. Both the girls saw that at a glance. He had clear-cut, regular features, fair hair and complexion, and his skin was pale, not merely from loss of blood, but from the delicacy of a city life.

"Poor child!" said Aurora, as she dropped on her knees beside him; "his jacket is all stained with blood; he must have been shot."

"Do you think he is dead?"

"Not yet, I hope; but we must stop this bleeding. Here, Julia, give me your handkerchief, and even her shirt, with hands that did not falter in the work of humanity from any false delicacy.

Julia threw a little silk companion exposed the white chest; but for all that she helped to staunch the hemmorrhage with her handkerchief as well as Aurora.

"That will do better," said Aurora, as she bound the cost; "it's rough doctoring, but it's better than none. What can have shot the child?"

Lo! look at his hands, why they are whiter even than yours, Julia!"

Julia smiled at the compliment.

"And now what's to be done next?"

"We must put him on my horse and carry him home."

"Why your horse?" asked Julia, jealously.

"Because he is lower than yours, and he can get on better."

But just at this moment the young man opened a pair of fine blue eyes, and gazed with astonishment on his two preservers.

"Water!" he gasped; "for God's sake give me some water!"

"Water!" repeated Julia, in dismay. "What shall we do? there is none nearer than the river or the village."

"Yes there is," said Aurora." Do you suppose I go out on a long day's hunt without water?" and as she spoke she drew out a pocket flask, and raising the young man's head on her knee, gave him a draught of what truth compels me to state was undied water, but well tempered with whisky. It seemed to revive him wonderfully; he spoke quite strongly this time.

"Thank you," he said; "thank you; you have saved my life."

A slight frown contracted Julia's brow, as she saw that he looked only at the pretty face bending over him; but Aurora hastened to say:

"You must thank us both for that, if you thank either."

Then the stranger looked at Julia, and this time there was so much admiration in his blue eyes that she colored again.

"And you, too, must let me take you home?" Aurora added.

"Yes," I shall be most grateful for your help, for I fear I can hardly go on alone with. I was shot by an Indian," he explained. "In the fight the other day, and in the confusion, I crawled in here to save myself from sculping. It was a awful scene," and he closed his eyes, as if to shut out his horror. "There has been a fright and massacre; I believe I am the only survivor of the mail party to Rocktown."

"Oh!" exclaimed Aurora, "what is heavy news indeed!"

One or two more questions on a theme of so much interest, and then the two girls addressed themselves to the task of removing the young stranger. It was able to walk with their help, though very slowly and feebly, and by their joint efforts was placed on Aurora's pony. She walked beside it, supporting him on one side while Julia gave him what help she could on the other. Then going on slowly, a discussion soon arose as to who should take him home; each she proffered her house as his asylum, but he set the matter at rest by saying, with many thanks:

"I have relations in Rocktown, and by my faith, I'll be so old friend of mine, and I was on my way to see them when this happened. "My name is Charlie Walton," he added, "I live in New York, but my health has not been good, of late, and I was sent out here on a journey across the plains. On my way I thought I would visit my old friend Niebol, and see how he liked frontier life; so I joined the mail party to Rocktown, and then came near losing my life."

Perhaps both the girls were disappointed by the information that the stranger was glad to visit his her rival would not have possession of the handsome stranger. And so, after conveying Charlie to the house of Niebol, a very physician in Rocktown, and seeing him warmly received they bade him good-by, and with more than usual cordiality parted from each other, to return to their distinct houses.

Charlie's wound proved to be not at all severe, and under his friend's skillful nursing he soon recovered. Indeed Dr. Niebol found it, on the third day, so much advanced that there was other wise, this shot in the chest, as it turned out to be a cure, though some what severe yet quite slight. But the young stranger's convalescence he had before suffered from. So that in a few weeks Charlie was about the village, feeling better than he had for many months before, with his pale cheeks lighted with a delicate rose tint of health, his fair hair and mustache carefully dressed, and his handsome face and stylish air full of appearance that he was the wonder and admiration of the young girls in the town. He was good friends with their fathers, and he had devoted as he paid only to those two who had first saved him.

Of course Aurora was puzzled, his attentions were so equally divided. If he walked about with one day with Julia, he was of coming the next morning to Aurora's house. And one afternoon beside Julia on her handsome bay horse, he was seen the next morning grouse-shooting with Aurora. Of course, he could see no preference, for even the girls themselves, not even Charlie himself, to tell the truth. He liked them both amazingly, they were something irresistibly fascinating to him in Aurora's frank manner, her bright face, and perfectly unconventional style of proceeding, to the young girl trained to hide herself fearlessly with him on all sorts of distant excursions, and the novelty of the possible danger as she was careless of the terror of possible beast or lurking Indian. To watch her as in her young amazonian dress, all of the sex, her loose shirt with its rolling collar displaying shapely her well rounded form, her face flushed with exercise, and her eyes sparkling with excitement, to mark the unstudied grace of her attitudes as she brought the rifle to her shoulder, and to note the unerring aim with which she fired, was a very charming to a man of the world, accustomed to the world manners and artificial attractions of city women.

But, then, with Julia there was perhaps even a more dangerous fascination; this girl was as unaffected as her rival, but she had much more study of the rules of society, and to see her check pride at his admiration, and that only made Aurora laugh, and to watch the deep lustre that those splendid black eyes grow humid at his approach—and then to appear so harmless as the innocent flirtation with Aurora.

In the midst of all this was very nice for Charlie, it was likely, at any time, to prove anything but a harmless sport to the girls. Julia was desperately and hopelessly in love with him almost from the first moment of their meeting, and Aurora had well enough to encourage very decidedly his attentions. If Julia had disliked Aurora, she had counted the hours when Charlie was with Aurora—every second an age of pain. There was still another person who was miserable about this time, and that was Hugh Wallace. He detested this handsome young New Yorker, who had come there and absorbed so much of the time of the woman he loved. It is true Aurora was always kind, and seemed glad as ever to see him, but then all knew he had not the polish and grace of this city stranger, and he feared desperately that her heart would be wiled away from him by his fascinating manners.

Thus matters stood when a grand picnic and shooting match came off near Rocktown. Charlie Walton was the principle mover in this affair. He was such a general favorite that it was not very hard for him to induce young people to join him in a day of frolic; he wanted to see something of the far-famed skill of the men at rifle-shooting, and it was agreed to make this a great day, which should begin with a picnic, be continued by a shooting match, and end with a dance in the evening.

The spot selected for the excursion was a lovely glen, distant only about half a mile from the village, as it was not safe for the male population to absent itself extensively on any great distance. This place was so near home that the ladies could easily be informed if any danger threatened their unarmed homes. The day chosen proved a lovely one. A clear September morning ushered in long bright hours of warm sunshine and cloudless beauty.

The collation, which came off at noon, was entirely successful; it was partaken of with immense gusto. Many groups of young people lounging among the rocks, and using stones for tables, and the prairie grass for plates. Among these Charlie was gayest of the gay, flying from one place to another, carrying laughter and mirth with him wherever he appeared. He flattered about like a handsome butterfly, from flower to flower, and there was scarcely a girl's cheek there but received a blush at a deeper flush at his approach, but with all his manner was so frank that their own vanity or love of them objected to his gay compliments.

Julia had that morning achieved a great triumph, and she had come with her. Yes, he was her escort, and she had conducted herself so well, would have him with her all day; but in this she was grievously disappointed, for as we have seen, as soon as he had reached the scene of the picnic his attentions spirit second to possess him, and he went wandering off with Aurora to another, often deserting Julia for a long time together. She sat watching him, with pale face and glittering eyes, as, after passing a group of young ladies, he flung himself down at last beside Aurora. There she saw his handsome face turned towards her lovely rival with most unmistakable admiration; she saw her look down to whisper in his ear, and even heard their merry laughter come ringing across the glen to her ears, like a knell of wretchedness.

It was very wrong for Aurora to be flirting thus openly, for she had come over this morning with Hugh Wallace, and the poor fellow was looking against a tree just back of her, quite as wretched as Julia herself. Aurora hated, and had broken up by the signal for the beginning of the shooting match.

"I must leave you now, Aurora; you know I came with Julia," said Charlie, as he started up.

"Yes, I came with Hugh," replied Aurora; and added, a little maliciously, "Poor girl, she has been forlorn enough while you have been away."

"Indeed!" Well, then, I must do my best to console her."

As Charlie ran off Aurora turned to Hugh. He met her with such a woe-begone expression on his face that she was deeply touched.

"Oh, Hugh, you don't mind my talking to Charlie, do you?"

"I don't know, Aurora, whether I ought to or not, but you know how much I love you, and you may guess how much I like to see you seem to prefer anyone."

Aurora frowned slightly at the ardent tone of the last words.

"Charlie Walton and I are good friends, that's all; but think Hugh Wallace, I don't give you the right to ask my questions at all."

"I know it, Aurora," sighed Hugh. "You know that I love you with all my heart, yet you will not give you care for me at all."

Aurora laughed as she took his arm, and the glance of her merry eyes was kind enough to console Hugh very considerably for any melancholy he might have felt.

"Now, Hugh, when Charlie rejoined Julia, she took of utter misery went to his heart; he saw and knew how great a love she had for him, and while yet he could not help whispering to her that all sorts of tender words, that brought the color back to her dark cheek, and the light to her eyes, long before they reached the village green, where the shooting match was to come off. Here Hugh Wallace had everything his own way; he could shoot with ease, and brought them to Aurora, who was flushed with delight at his victory, and welcomed him with a smile that made his heart proved her deep interest in his success.

Then these prizes were over, the young girls had their meal of chat. This was the part of the day upon which Charlie had especially counted, and he was resolved he was off. He took place at Julia's side, with a hasty apology, to stand beside each one of the fair competitors, with a cheering word and gay smile. The prize which Aurora gained was his own watch and chain, a very elegant affair, so elaborately wrought as to be more suitable for a lady's wear than a man's. He had bought it in a caprice, and was now heartily glad that he had it to offer as the contending damsels.

It was surprising what good shots they nearly all were—these young amazons of the west. One after another they stepped out, and, with excellent aim, sent the bullets away into the target, and generally close to the bull's eye. They had all tried their luck but Julia and Aurora, who, with the easy assurance of victory, chose to be last. Julia was a little nervous as she advanced. It was Charlie who loaded her rifle for her, and he was by her side, whispering, in his sweetest tones:

"For my sake, Julia, you must be sure to win."

But that eloquent look, those earnest words, were not calculated to steady her nerves, and when she raised her rifle to her shoulder her hand trembled and her shots were all three of them unusually bad. She turned away her face, dark as death in passion and rage, as she heard Charlie's voice exclaiming:

"Oh, terrible, horrible! Why no one to try to look for those shots!"

She ran alone to her seat and sat down with a heart full of anger and hatred for the haughty girl who had taken her place. Hugh Wallace had loaded Aurora's rifle and stood by her side, but Charlie was forgiving none her aid. As she took her place, he stepped close to her with some low words, but she stopped him by turning upon him her clear eyes, full of reproof, in a very audible tone:

"Stand back, Charlie Walton. I don't mean you to come here and upset my aim with some of your nonsensical flattery, as you did Julia Bolton's just now."

Julia groaned her teeth with rage at the words and started to her feet. Just then Aurora lifted her rifle, and with the coolness of a practised shot adjusted the aim, and sent a ball right through the bull's-eye. A shout proclaimed her victory, and Julia, with glittering eyes and white face, drew a little nearer. Charlie was loud in his congratulations; Julia could hear every word of his eager praise. Aurora only laughed, while Hugh's deep eyes grieved with an earnest pleasure that made it to have been better than all Charlie's extravagant expressions.

Again Aurora took her reloaded rifle, and again the ball flew straight to the mark. Julia was crazed beyond reason by this and Charlie's fresh burst of delight in her prowess. For the third and last time Aurora raised her rifle, but just as she had adjusted the sight and had her finger on the trigger, Julia uttered her name in a quick, hoarse voice:

"Aurora!"

Any lower less calmly steady than Aurora's would have been upset. Had her finger on the delicate trigger trembled in the least, the ball would have lodged outside of the mark, inside that, for Aurora had nerves of steel and a will of iron, and she slowly dropped the rifle and turned a resolute face, with no angry eyes, to Julia.

"Stand back, Julia Bolton," she said; "you have no business here."

"I will stand where I please," retorted Julia, with pallid lips.

"How can you?" exclaimed Aurora. "Don't you know it's cause to try to spoil my aim?"

"Ah, ah!" laughed Julia. "Are you afraid of me? After all, they, Aurora Field, you are a coward."

Aurora's eyes fairly blazed indignant lightning.

"I'll not stop to pay you words now," she said. "But this quarrel is disgraceful now; to-morrow we will settle it."

"To-morrow," repeated Julia, with trembling lips. "No; to-night" and she dropped back a pace.

Then Aurora set her teeth tight, and turned again to the target. Once more she raised the rifle to her shoulder, and, adjusting it carefully, shot her ball half as unerringly to the centre as the two first. Cheer after cheer summoned her victory. Julia, with a face dark as Nemisis, unseconded her success, and saw Charlie drop on his knees before Aurora, and present her the box containing the chain.

Aurora for once more all smiles and blushes, her momentary anger seemingly forgotten. Julia could endure it no more, and with a heart full of almost despairing envy and jealousy, stole away.

Neither of the young men had heard enough of the dialogue between the two girls to see how serious it was. Charlie liked Aurora so well that he was heartily glad of her success, and this time Hugh was very jealous, for he saw how Aurora's bright eyes had looked first towards him amid the triumph, and he offered her his arm to lead her away—a proud, loud, happy man. When the excitement had a little subsided, Charlie turned to look for Julia; but she had disappeared, and a good deal annoyed at the neglect he thought she had seemed very pointed, he went off in search of her.

Meantime Aurora walked home with Hugh to change her dress for the evening. A regret at the moment at the gate of the cottage, and then bade her goodby, with the promise to rejoin him at home. Aurora started up the little bordered path to the door, but was arrested after a few steps by a dark shadow which started out from behind the bushes.

"Julia Bolton!" she exclaimed. "What brought you here?"

"Revenge!" said Julia, and her eyes glistened as she spoke with a fierce fire. "You told me my words were false and abhorrent; I have come to prove them true."

"You said I was a coward," replied Aurora, with sudden anger, "and you know that was a lie."

"Alie!" hissed Julia. "Prove it, then, Aurora Field. We are two women, and so long as neither of say we must fight; but I dare you to stand before me, and let us test by which is the best shot in a struggle of life and death."

"You want to fight a duel!" exclaimed Aurora.

"Yes; I want to end this long contest. I hate you, Aurora Field, and you hate me;" she added passionately: "I will not live any longer to suffer from your taunting successes. I will either kill you or die in the attempt."

"Oh, but it's absurd for me two girls to fight a duel," urged Aurora.

"Ah, then you are afraid," sneered Julia. "You are a coward!"

Aurora's cheek flushed at the word with ready anger.

"I am not a coward; but, Julia, remember, I am a better shot than you."

"So you boast; but I will prove that false, too! Ah, you think to frighten me; but I had better die than endure this life another day, and if you will not fight with me I will denounce you throughout the village for a coward and a liar!"

Aurora's will prairie blood was on fire now.

"Well, let us end this at once, then," she said: "I do not know why I should endure such insults more than a man. Your blood be on your own head!"

"Come then," was all the reply that Julia made. She cannot, of course have any seconds; we must fight it out alone."

"Go on," replied Aurora, in a resolute voice; "choose the place yourself—our weapons we have with us."

Julia went out of the little gate, and Aurora followed in silence. The sunset was beginning to fade, but it was still light enough for their purpose, as they walked rapidly away from the village, and soon reached a spot screened from view by a little copse. Here Julia halted when she had reached an open space, sheltered on all sides by small trees, and came to a stand.

"This is the moment," said Julia, and she came close up to her antagonist, her dark eyes glittering, and her white teeth set. "Whoever loses this day shall live no longer."

"Ah!" cried Aurora, "that then is your real reason. You want to fight for the love of that man Conrad stranger."

"Yes," replied Julia; "I care not if you know it now that I do not mean to be robbed of him by yours or mine this night, wholly and for ever."

"You shall see!" and a faint smile curled Aurora's lovely lips. He exasperated Julia intensely.

"Go in" said she, "if the village clock will strike eight, and I will count the moments, as the fourth stroke I shall fire, and we will see if at last your pride will not be humbled."

Aurora coldly smiled, but she looked earnestly at Julia, and said:

"Won't you shake hands? I never fought a duel before, but I have heard that antagonists do it."

"No!" retorted Julia angrily, "I detest you, and I will not pretend to be friends with you. I will kill you if I can, or you may kill me—it's no use keeping terms."

And without another word, she turned her back and walked resolutely off the twenty steps. Again Aurora's eyes swept over Aurora's face, and then she, too, measured off the distance, and turning at the agreed point, the two rivals faced each other.

They each wore the hunting costume that had won admiration from Charlie's pen, with full buttons, pink ribbon under her white collar, and a black hat and feather on her shining curls, while Aurora's had a cockade pinned from a button of her jacket. Julia watched the light shine on it in the moments of waiting, and set her heart to her deadly purpose.

So these two girls stood there, the shadow of the trees brooding over them on one side, on the other the sun, just sinking in splendor, reflected the crowning sky gleaming brightly with the vanishing hues of sunset, and the sound alternately of the quiet and the faint sigh of the wind through the trees, or the cry of some bird flying low to seek its nest. Then Aurora seemed to drop themselves out slowly to the two figures standing there motionless, leaning on their rifles; but suddenly there fell still on every ear the sound of the Rocktown clock. In an instant both girls were on the alert, the two rifles were brought to the shoulder at the same second.

One! two! three!

Aurora was taking steady, cool aim, while Julia, with eyes glowing like fire, adjusted her piece with deadly desperation.

Four!

There were two simultaneous shots. Aurora reeled and her hat was dashed from her head, but Julia dropped on the ground. Aurora's ball had missed her by half an inch; the hat was shot, though low in the crown; the curly head beneath had narrowly escaped.

Aurora dropped her piece and rushed to her rival's side. She lay on the ground gasping, and pale.

"My God, Julia!" she exclaimed, "I have not missed my aim after all, and hurt you badly."

"It is my arm," screamed Julia, "I cannot move it."

"Thank heaven!" exclaimed Aurora. "I did not mean to do anything more than wing you; I should have been miserable if I had really injured you."

"And you are not hit?"

"No; but you came very near doing for me. It has set my blood on fire, indeed; half an inch lower and I should have been gone."

"I am glad I did not kill you," moaned Julia, in a faint voice. "I am sorry you did not kill me, for now you will triumph in everything."

"Not a bit of it," laughed Aurora. "Let me help you up, and you will be all right in a day or two, and we shall be friends yet."

"Help me up!" cried Julia: "leave me here to die, and go you to be happy with Charlie."

"With Charlie!" repeated Aurora, this time laughing out. "Why my dear girl, I don't want him any more than he wants me. I am engaged to Hugh Wallace."

"You are! Oh, forgive me, Aurora," cried Julia, with a glad happy light in her face. "Why did you not tell me, and save all this folly?"

"I would if you had not been so insulting then, Julia. I don't want to talk of it, but you know you were rather hard on me."

"Yes, yes, it was all my fault," replied Julia. "But you would forgive me if you knew how I have suffered."

"Well, well, it is all over now, and you must let me help you home."

But just at this moment, two new actors appeared on the scene; Charlie Walton and Hugh Wallace dashed through the grove.

"Here they are!" cried Hugh, as he came plunging to the spot where the two girls were. Charlie followed close behind, and came up to see the strange group—both lying on the ground, Julia white, Aurora kneeling beside her. In an instant all his bright smiles were gone, and he was down beside the wounded girl.

"Julia, my darling! my darling! what has happened?"

As those tender words, Julia turned her large black eyes on Charlie with a look of unspeakable affection, and suffered him unresistingly to clasp her in his arms.

"We have been fighting a duel," said Aurora, as she rose to her feet, "and I believe I am the victor."

"A duel!" exclaimed Charlie, in blank amazement.

"Yes, sir—a duel for you, and as I am the successful one, you ought, of rights, to belong to me."

Charlie stared Julia tighter, with a look of bewildered horror, that made Aurora herself give a little mocking laugh.

"You need not look so alarmed," she said. "I don't want you. I am but a still prairie girl, and I had rather have a prairie hunter for my mate, and she pretty well for me. Hugh's with a proud smile; "but as for you, you are a city man, and I am a prairie girl. You will need a tame, gentle love, or fairer, or better one than she whom you have won this day. Julia, you have staked her life and your love."

There is little need to relate all the particulars of the rest of the story. A few words of explanation, and it is done. It seems that when Hugh discovered Julia's duel, he was not at home, her strange absence, which her mother could not explain, frightened her, and he went off in search of her, where he encountered Charlie employed in carrying the fatal challenge to two pistol meetings, with a vague misgiving that they might be together. A few words explained the peril of their self-appointed position, and discovered the direction in which they had gone. Just then came the report of guns, and the sound of the rifle shots quickened their speed when they reached the wood, and lead them to the scene of the duel.

Julia was so happy in her second love, and so grateful to Aurora, that she took all the chances of the strange affair on herself. She wound proved her arm herself, which delayed the ball-cure by the help of Dr. Nichol's ears and Charlie's devotion, but in a short time, and nothing will satisfy her, but that her own wedding and Aurora's should take place on the same day.

The double marriage was the most splendid affair that had ever been seen in Rocktown, and for many days the traditions of the beauty of the two brides, the magnificence of the presents Charlie had sent on purpose for them, and the gaiety of the grand hall afterwards, form the sequel to every recital of the romance of the Prairie Girls' Duel.

GUY'S FOLLY,

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE HERTON ST JOHN.

CHAPTER XV.—THE "ROSE AND ANCHOR."

THERE is a low road (but it is not much frequented for all that, as it is only round-about) that passes at the foot of the range of hills which skirts the Cornish coast for a distance of about twenty miles or so from Thornton Heath; and as you go along this road, either up or down, the sea is always in view, and you can see the vessels sailing on, and you are beneath the shadow of the great white cliffs, that sweep in many masses, or jut out in lofty crags and bold picturesque coast line.

You may view the scene with what feelings you please, because steamboats have of late years put the sailing vessels out of fashion, and deprived an air with filthy puffs of coal smoke; and because an unfortunate mail packet and all her passengers were sent to the bottom of this very bay, during a very heavy gale; but if you were to walk this way on any fine summer afternoon, you would say, as the sunlight danced on the rocks, and outwards at the sea, that there are few scenes more unpicturesque and romantic than it. If you are a stranger in the neighborhood, you would hardly deem it possible that those tiny wavelets which glide and sparkle in the sunshine, till they fret themselves to pieces on the soft sands at your feet, could be lashed by the fury of the storm into mountains of water, which hurl themselves and ocean serpents the tall barrier of rock, as if they could hear everything before them in their resistless fury.

On the opposite side of the bay is a little village, which contains the thriving place of a wide family in the county, surrounded by a green patch of cultivated land, sloping pleasantly upwards from the bay, and sweeping gently by itself, with its picturesque cemetery, under the great blue hills frowning behind, those hills which form the bay, absolutely like a natural little haunt of the capricious sprite of romance. And the fishing smacks gliding about the bay with their white sails glistening in the sun, and the grey sea-gulls lazily flap their wings over head, or rapidly dive downwards after their fleet prey, give the whole place an appearance which can hardly be depicted by poet's pen or painter's brush.

Well, between this road and the water's edge, and before it winds off by the old castle—which forms such a prominent landmark to the passing mariner—there stands a little cluster of five or six fishermen's cottages, which, from the hill above them, or from the sea as you sailed past, looked just like great white shells at a larger size than usually dropped down upon the green commons between the hills and the sandy beach.

The passer-by might have seen plenty of rural beauty, for the fishermen generally had numerous families; and the girls were so wild in their costume—I mention that of any stranger on the road stopped to observe them as they sat in groups on the green, mending their father's nets, they would rise and run off like startled fawns, hide amongst the rocks, or trip back into the cottages.

Nearly opposite this little fishing hamlet a winding pathway led right upwards among the hills to the lonely mansion.

And here stood an old inn, perched, like an eagle's nest on the top of a crag.

It was called the "Rose and Anchor," and was kept by an old man, part farmer, part fisherman, and partly by his wife and daughter.

For people who had tasted his liquors said that best sugar-brandy was to be procured there, and that the rich, ripe wines of Portugal and Spain were stored up in profusion in his cellar, along with the sparkling champagne and ruby claret of the French vineyards.

It was a queer old place: its walls were composed of huge blocks of chalk, interspersed with the brown timbers of wood; its roof was also loosely piled on the crooked rafters. It looked as if a strong hand would scatter it in fragments at all the hill-side.

In the kitchen of this inn five men were seated one evening along with the landlord.

They were rough, weather-beaten men, apparently from the fishing village beneath; and as they sat by the huge fire that took off the chill of the weather, and of the grey November fog which was swiftly and steadily rolling upwards from the sea.

In attendance on the party was the landlord's pretty daughter.

Jane, as her father called her, was a pretty girl, about eighteen years of age.

She was a brunette, with long ringlets down her back, was of a bright golden hue, reminding the beholder of a shower of bright sunbeams; her eyes were of a deep violet blue, which, in contrast of unfathomable depth, were large and bright; her skin fair and delicate; her figure well proportioned, neither too tall nor yet too short.

Her face was pleasant to behold. Her rosy cheeks, cherry lips, and the row of pearly white teeth, with the smile that showed them to advantage, made a picture which few could look upon without admiration.

The men who were sitting in the kitchen, rough and uncouth though they looked, treated her with respect and civility; and no rough jest and ribald jibe was uttered at her expense as she tripped about the kitchen.

One of the men seemed to pay her the most marked attention.

He was a bold, handsome-looking sailor, with curling black hair, a ruddy face, deep-toned by exposure to sun and wind, and a pair of piercing black eyes.

"Well, a gale will do us no harm," replied another man, "there will be sure something to pick up afterwards."

"If the fog continues, we shall be able to do something more," said the handsome sailor.

"But supposing he does not come?" suggested the landlord.

"He will not fail to come, I should think," said the first speaker.

"And if he does not come, we can manage without him," said the sailor's bold, handsome face.

"Here, Jenny, fill all these glasses;" cried the landlord, "and bring me my tobacco-pouch."

The pretty girl hurried to obey the order, and left the room.

The gentleman continued to look anxiously towards the door for the person they expected, and then he rose, opened the door, and looked out. A candle in the window, to guide the coming visitor to the house.

But, in spite of their anxiety, he came not, and the party returned to their grog, to their pipes, and conversation.

Meanwhile, through the fog and the misty atmosphere, up the steep hills, and down the steep inclines, a young man was toiling.

He was dressed in a rough suit of clothes with leather gaiters, and in his hand a heavy stick, which he used with many more for the purpose of support.

He was very travel-stained he was, and ever and anon he leaned upon his staff or against the gates that he reached, to rest at once his weary limbs, and even on the damp earth itself.

The night had overtaken him on once early in the morning from the town some miles distant; and now, having left the last village far behind, he was becoming in despair of meeting any place where he might rest for the night.

The fog, which, while it lasted, shrouded, he discovered what seemed at first a ball of fire.

The light appeared to be about two miles from him, and he hailed it with fresh strength, for he gave a few vigorous strides forward, and then, as the fog rolled away, the place, which promised soon to shorten the distance between him and his night's rest, developed itself to his eyes like an ignis fatuus.

Thank heaven! he sneered it, he saw that it was a light streaming from a window of an inn.

"Thank heaven!" he said, aloud, "this is, indeed, a welcome sight."

And swinging his stick joyfully around his head, he quickened his pace through mist and mist.

It was not long before the sounds of revelry within the house reached his ears, and not long before he stood at the bar of the inn, asking for accommodation.

The host eyed him inquiringly.

"Is that Jane, I suppose," he whispered to his daughter, who had now entered the bar. "I'd better go and look after the customer."

Jane Turner eyed the new-comer inquiringly; he was more so because he was handsome and well shaped.

Then, without any further words with her father, she moved down the bar-door, and coming out, said, gently:

"This way, sir; your friends are expecting you."

There was a smile of astonishment on the young stranger's handsome features as the girl addressed him; but, before he could answer, she had half led, half pushed him into the room where the apartment party of fishermen were assembled.

Whether they had expected him or not will be seen presently. At any rate, the new-comer was received with a cheer.

EXTERIOR VIEW OF THE GREAT NORTH-WESTERN SANITARY FAIR BUILDINGS, CHICAGO, ILL., HELD IN JUNE, 1865.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. L. HUBZ.

CHICAGO SANITARY FAIR.

THE great North-western Sanitary Fair—Illustrations of which we give this week—has closed, and Chicago has added her mite—a few hundred thousand dollars—for the relief of our sick and wounded soldiers. On the 30th of May last, the day of opening, the weather was most propitious, and the inaugural ceremonies, consisting of a grand procession of troops from Camp Douglass, independent of military organizations, firemen and civic societies, were very imposing. The opening exercises commenced at 8 P. M., in the spacious Dearborn Park Hall. Music, social and instrumental, a poem written and delivered by Thomas Buchanan Read, and an oration by Governor Oglesby, were the features of the day.

The buildings—erected especially for the purpose—were more extensive, and in point of design, more beautiful than any structure ever raised for the same purpose in this country. The grand attraction was Union Hall, in the main building, where articles of virtue and contributions from nearly every State in the Union were displayed. The visit of Gens. Grant and Sherman to the fair tended materially to swell the receipts, and was the occasion of a grand demonstration of regard on the part of the people of Chicago for those great soldiers.

DEDICATION OF THE LOWELL MONUMENT.

THE anniversary of Bunker Hill was fitly chosen by the citizens of Lowell for the dedication of their monument to the memory of Luther C. Ladd and Addison O. Whitney, who were among the very first to fall in the great rebellion, being killed by the rebel mob of Baltimore on the 17th of April—another anniversary, it being that of Lexington.

The cowardly and brutal attack on the 6th regiment, as they passed through Baltimore on their way to Washington, in response to President Lincoln's proclamation, is too well remembered to need any but the briefest allusion. The attack was made in Pratt street on the troops as they were marching from the cars to the Washington depot. In the encounter Ladd and Whitney of Company D, Lowell, and Charles A. Taylor, of Boston, were killed, and S. H. Needham of Company I, Lawrence, was mortally wounded, and survived but a few days.

On May 6th, 1861, the bodies of Ladd and Whitney were taken to Lowell, and buried with most impressive funeral ceremonies.

Soon after their death it was proposed to erect a monument to their memory, and the legislature of 1863 appropriated $3,000 for that purpose, on condition that Lowell would do the same. This was done, and early in 1864, the design of Woodcock and Meacham, of Boston, was adopted, and Merrimac square, hereafter to be called Monument square, was chosen as the site. The memorial was erected early last April, and the dedication decided to be held on the 19th of June.

The monument is of Concord granite—the plan is cruciform, measuring 15 feet on the longer arms, and 12 feet on the shorter. The whole height is 27 feet 6 inches.

The prominent features of the design consist of a central shaft placed upon a plinth, and also of a high base, upon two sides of which, forming the longer arms, are two sarcophagi, having on each side, respectively, the names of the martyred soldiers, L. C. Ladd and A. O. Whitney, and inserted in the ends are raised laurel wreaths.

The cornices of the sarcophagi are ornamented with 13 raised stars. Upon the other two sides of the base, forming the shorter arms, are two plinths, the same height as the sarcophagi, with the inscriptions. On the Merrimac street side are the words:

"Addison O. Whitney, born in Waldo, Me., Oct. 30, 1839; Luther C. Ladd born in Alexandria, N. H., Dec. 22, 1843; marched from Lowell in the 6th M. V. M. to the defence of the national capital, and fell illegally slain by a mob in the attack on their regiment while passing through Baltimore, April 19th, 1861. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the city of Lowell dedicated this monument to their memory.

"April 19, 1865."

On the Moody street side is the following:

"Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail
Or knock the breast; no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise or blame; nothing but well and fair,
And what may quiet us in a death so noble.
"1861."

The horizontal are merged into the vertical lines by fluted trusses, with raised stars resting upon the four arms, and above these is a plinth with a moulded base and ornamented cornice, on two sides of which are bronze medallions of the coat of arms of the state of Massachusetts and of the city of Lowell. Upon this plinth is a shaft terminating with a pyramid, below which there are four stars, one on each side. The composition has a pleasing outline, and is highly creditable to the taste of the committee and the skill of the designers.

The procession was a very long one and made a fine appearance. It reached Monument square at 1¼ o'clock, and the Masonic ceremonies were the first in order, which were under the direction of Wyseman Marshall, Esq., M. W. Grand Master, after which the civic ceremonies took place.

The decorations along the route of procession, and in many other parts of the city are quite extensive and appropriate.

WARWICK MILLS, RICHMOND, VA.

THESE renowned mills present a very melancholy spectacle compared to what they did before the rebellion. We give a sketch, made by our artist just after the occupation of the city by our troops. These mills have been filled with produce throughout the war, and considerable stores were left there when the rebels abandoned their capital.

INTERIOR VIEW OF THE UNION HALL, NORTH-WESTERN SANITARY FAIR BUILDING, CHICAGO, ILL.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. L. HUBZ.

A LONDON FOG.

MOST of our readers, we have no doubt, will have heard of that famous but foul congregation of vapors called a London fog, which, when it chooses to appear, casts a pall of thickest darkness over the great metropolis, changing day into night, and mystifying and confounding the myriads of human beings that dwell therein. This phenomenon, however, does not present itself every day, or even every year; it arrives only during certain states of the weather, and chiefly in winter, when the wind brings up the cold thick vapors from the German ocean, and mingles them with the smoke of the metropolis. When the fog hangs over the streets to only a partial extent, there is produced a peculiar opacity in the air overhead, which is humorously but correctly defined as a "pea-soup atmosphere," from its resemblance to that dull yellow liquid. But when the fog arrives in all its force and substantiality, the atmosphere is beyond pea-soup pitch; and it is so dense and murky, that it may almost be felt and handled; and passengers on the streets can no more see through it than could fishes see through perfectly muddy water.

On the 23d of December, 1813, London was enveloped in a fog, the most dense that had been witnessed for several years. The thickness of the vapor in the early part of the day was not so very great as to be attended with extraordinary inconvenience; but the opacity gradually increased, and in the city, where the fog is always the most dense, there was, about four o'clock, no possibility of discerning an object at the distance of a few paces. The carriages and wagons moving along the street were not discoverable from the flagways, and the passengers on the latter derived very little aid from the lights in the windows, or from the lamps, as most of the shops, from fear of accidents, were shut, and the lamps afforded but a very feeble twinkling light, not visible until a near approach. The coachmen alighted from their boxes to lead their horses, and the link boys were in great numbers to offer their assistance; but with every possible care and precaution, the passengers, both on foot and in carriages, seldom succeeded in making their way without mistakes—and horses and carriages frequently deviated from the streets to the flagways, to the imminent danger of foot-passengers.

The noises made by the people in the streets were frightful—some shrieking from fear or terror when surprised by the sudden approach of a horse or a carriage; others calling out to their fellow-travelers to warn them of danger, or anxiously inquiring their way, and many whistling and singing to make known that they were approaching. In a number of cases, the company deserted their carriages, which remained stationary, the coachmen not knowing where they were. Various sums, from half-a-crown to ten shillings, were obtained by link-boys for conducting a carriage through a single street. Nor was the presence and influence of the dense accumulation of vapors felt only out of doors. In the theatres, the actors on the stage were barely visible to the audience; and even private houses, though closed, and well furnished with fires, were filled and darkened by this unwelcome visitant. Between eleven and twelve o'clock, however, the rolling of carriages which had regained the power of motion, indicated the departure of the fog, and by midnight the metropolis had nearly resumed the appearance usually presented by it at that hour. Many, many thousands, who had been surprised at a distance from home, were thus able for the first time to make their way to their firesides, and rejoin their anxious and alarmed families.

The fog, while it lasted, afforded a golden opportunity to thieves and pickpockets, and of this they failed not to avail themselves. A most daring gang of thieves paraded Piccadilly, and committed extensive depredations on the public with impunity. About the hour of five o'clock, several ladies, who had hired a coach, alighted near the barracks at Knightsbridge, and in consequence of the intense fog, they employed a link-boy to light them as far as the Strand. While they were proceeding along near the Cannon Brewhouse, a dastardly fellow came up with a link blazing in his hand, and dashed it among the ladies, six in number, which threw them into the utmost confusion. The lighted stuff that was annexed to the link, stuck to the ladies' dresses, and burned them very much. At this instant a great many persons came up, who attempted to save the female's dresses from burning, and cried shame at the fellow's wanton act. In the confusion—which was evidently created for the purpose of robbery—one of the ladies was deprived of a scarf, and several persons around also lost their property at the same moment. Various other depredations were committed about the same period, along Piccadilly and elsewhere. The different roads leading to Kensington, Hammersmith, and other suburbs, were rendered most dangerous by foot-pads. It was a benefit night for the coachmakers. A foreign gentleman driving through Temple Bar, met a broad-wheeled wagon on the city side, which, coming in contact with his chaise, dashed it to pieces. Almost every street presented a similar misfortune. Two of the mails, passing along the Strand about seven o'clock, ran against each other, and were both stopped with a shock by the locking of the wheels. The coachman was thrown from one of them by the concussion, but escaped, fortunately, with a few bruises. There were various cases, nevertheless, where the injury was of a more deplorable character. Several persons were run over by carriages and killed in the attempt to cross streets.

These are but a few of the misfortunes attendant upon a London fog. The robberies in shops and houses were without number. Thieves would enter a place of business, ask for some article under pretence of purchasing it, and in an instant snatch up something and make off with it. If they once got into the fog, pursuit was out of the question.

AN American lady, in very reduced circumstances, but who had once occupied a superior station, formed a collection of the varied leaves of the magnificent trees for which the forests of America are so celebrated, and whose brilliant tints are well known to exceed in vivid coloring even the foliage of tropical plants. Part of this curious collection was placed in an album, and sent to Queen Victoria, and a precisely similar album was sent by the same steamer to the Empress of the French. But the reception of the poor lady's offering at the different courts in question was very different. From the first arrived an acknowledgment, penned by an official, stating that "for once" the sovereign "had consented to accept the offering, which, however, it was hoped, would not be considered as a precedent or encouragement for any future similar gifts." From the second the donor had the infinite gratification of receiving a few lines from the pen of her imperial majesty, expressing her surprise at the extreme beauty of the specimens contained in the album, qu'elle trouvait ravissante, and requesting the lady to accept the ring which she inclosed, as a token of her reconnaissance.

DESERTED.

The river flowed past with the light on its breast,
And the weeds went oddying by,
And the round red sun sank down in the west
When my love's loving lips to my lips were prest,
Under the evening sky.

Now weeping alone for the river I stray,
For my love he has left me this many a day,
Left me to droop and die!

As the river flowed then the river flows still,
In ripple, and foam, and spray,
On by the church, and round by the hill,
And under the shiver of the old burnt mill,
And out to the fading day.

But I live it is no more, for delight grows cold
When the song is sung, and the tale is told,
And the heart is given away!

Oh, river run fast! Oh, river run fast!
To where the sea is the soul
For the sun has gone down on my beautiful past,
And the hopes that like bread on the waters I cast
Have died away like the!

So the dream it is fled, and the day it is done,
And my life still murmurs the name of one
Who will never come back to me!

CHAPTER XXVIII—CONTINUED.

He roused himself from his brief reverie to appeal once more to the elderly ballet girl, who had seated herself by the little Pembroke table, on which her newspaper evidently borrowed from the establishment below, and transformed into a kind of parliament by her action of grease.

"Give me what information you can about my cousin," he said, imploringly; "and if you will accept any little present from me in acknowledgment of your kindness, I will send you a cheque to-morrow morning, and you shall purchase what you please as a memorial of your friendship for my poor little Susy."

A faint flush kindled in Miss Willoughby's pale cheeks. It stopped. Oh, bright representative of an El Dorado, only to be thought of in some happy dream, Clara Willoughby, otherwise Mary Ann Jones, had never seen a thing in a cheque since the happy time in which she had been solumnine at the tumultuous bride theatre in a morning dress, and the colonel himself had taken five pounds' worth of tickets for her benefit.

"You are very kind," she said, "but I don't want a payment for the little help I can give you. Miss Turner is a very quiet young person; and though we are friendly together by and by, and though we chat nothing of her history; and when she went away this morning, having only been taken on as an extra, and her engagement expiring last night, she said, 'You've been very good to me Clara, and I shall always remember you kindly, and if there's ever anything in my power to do for you I'll write and tell you where I am.' You mustn't be offended because I don't tell you where I am going. I don't quite know myself. I have one string to my mind yet; there's a place I want to go to, and friends I want to see, but I don't think I shall bring myself to it there, or to see them."

"But how did she come to be at the theatre with you?" inquired Francis. "I should think at all ways of getting a living, that must be the very last that would occur to my cousin Susan."

"That's very true," answered Miss Willoughby: "but it takes a woman long to come to the last way by which she can earn her bread; the way must be so many. I can tell you, I should not remain came to be at Drury Lane, for I was the means of getting her engaged; and it all came about, as most things, quite promiscuously. I suppose you know that Susan Turner is a married woman, and has a child?"

"Yes, I do know of her unhappy marriage."

"It was at the house of a respectable elderly person who took care of her child and mine, that I first met Susan Turner, and got friendly off and on, I was a good deal of your cousin; but see her as often as you would, she was so quiet and so reserved, that you never got anything like intimate with her. At first she was dressed like a lady, and she had a very little gold watch and chain, and many things that had cost money; but little by little all these disappeared, and she seemed to get very poor. One day, when I was there, it came out somehow, that she was doing plain needlework for one of the great city outfitting houses in the city; and it came out what a hard life it was, and, worse than hard—uncertain; so then, between you and me and the gatepost, for the new piece, I proposed to her that she should try and get engaged with my help. It would be much lighter work than the plain sewing, and better pay. Well, at first she was very much against it, but after a deal of persuasion she gave way, and I got her the engagement. That was full five months ago; for the piece had a long run. She had been lodging in one room at Chelsea until then, for the sake of being near her boy, and she left that lodging to come and share mine."

"And do you think she will go back to the old lodging?"

"I doubt it. She seemed so uncertain that I really don't think she'd made up her mind where to go."

"But she is likely to have gone straight to her child!" cried Francis. "Will you give me the address of the old woman at Chelsea? Oh, I thank you so much for giving me this clue. I must find my poor girl now!"

She handed Francis the address, which was a very low one.

He grasped the dancer's hand in his heartiest way, and left Drydene street in impetuous haste.

The door of the house to which he was directed stood ajar. Francis pushed it open and went into the passage. Three steps brought him to the door of the little room, which was the common property of shop and parlor, with a slight flavor of bedroom. A woman—a gurlish creature still, but pale and worn-looked—was sitting by the window sewing, with a child of four years old in her arms. Also for the handiwork of sorrow, the destroyer the soft brown hair, the tender hazel eyes, alone remained of the rustic beauty which Francis Trelethlyn remembered smiling at him upon the threshold of his native county.

His childhood came back to him with all its unconscious happiness, and he felt on him knees by his cousin's chair in a tumult of emotion.

"Susie, my darling, my pet. At last, at last I have found you!"

The boy slid from his mother's arms, frightened by this tumultuous stranger. Susan rose pale and trembling, and clutched up her basket and spread before her face, as if even now she would have hidden herself from her cousin.

"Oh, Francis," she cried, "don't come near me—don't look at me. Oh, heaven have pity on me! I have so prayed that now before ever knew me in what childhood should see me now."

"But, my darling, why, why should you hide yourself from me, and the sister of his brother would apply itself to plotting against him?

But the coldness so apparent in Harcourt's reception of the stranger's wanderer made no impression whatever on that gentleman. Roderick Lowther stretched his long legs upon his brother's hearth-rug, and contemplated his brother's cigars, with a serene indifference as to his brother's feelings.

"If you dine anywhere to-day you can take me with you," he said, blandly; "and tomorrow I'll introduce you to a splendid set of fellows at the Travellers'. You haven't thought of an heiress lately, I suppose?"

"No."

"Ah, you will bit upon something in that way presently, I dare say, if you run your mind's eye over your visiting list. I'm in no hurry. There's nothing I like generally in these days of railroads and photography."

"And you really would marry?" said Harcourt, with a look of infinite curiosity. "I suppose you have heard nothing of——"

"Not a word," answered Roderick, rather hastily. "I know that she is going to talk about, and as that's rather an unpleasant subject to me, we may as well agree to avoid it. I wrote a letter would, perhaps, be more to the point, promising to do what I considered my duty. I don't profess to be a generous man, and I freely acknowledge that I am not. I wrote that letter, and I consider that which I considered my duty was—well, very generous: I gave her more than I could afford. However, as I observed before, we'll agree to avoid the subject. Suppose we discuss your affairs?"

"I have none to discuss, as you did not."

"Of course, my dear boy; but as I am carefully disposed myself, I don't mean to be kept in the dark by the more sanguine of brothers who ever skulked in the face of an amiable relative. You used to be engaged to an heiress—something in Yorkshire, wasn't it—Miss Hilderson, or Hilbury, or Hilbrow? Hilbrow, I should be something of that sort on the cards, I believe?"

"There used to be, but there has ceased to be any thing between Miss Hilbrow and me."

"Ah, Miss Hilderson—or Hilbury—has fallen you, I suppose?"

"No, indeed."

"And the man who has married——"

"Is my very good friend, the happy possessor of a handsome face, a large fortune, and the man at whose house I dine to-day."

"Oh!" exclaimed Roderick Lowther, lengthening his face into a look of extremest capacity of extension; "oh, I think I begin to understand your policy. You have married a rich man, and have become intimate with the husband and coalesce with the wife. The husband is a sickly fellow—consumptive, perhaps, and never long?"

"The husband is something over six feet high, and has the shoulders of a Hegardeman; and if you are not for his dissipated habits, might live to be ninety."

"Ah, if it were not for his dissipated habits, I should be inclined to think! My dear Harcourt, what a very transparent game you are playing, and what a consummate fool you must be under every circumstance to let me through it. Why not a bond of union between us; all for one and one for all, like Dumas' musketeers? Help me to the heiress, and I'll help you on après le dîner——; what's the lady's name by-the-by?"

There was a look of affection between these two here, the likeness which they bore to each other morally as well as physically, seemed to have a kindly feeling between their relations. Francis knew each other and they distrusted each other. Perhaps it would have been scarcely too much to say that they loved each other.

But they went out to dinner together, nevertheless, and Harcourt smilingly introduced his brother to Mrs. Trelethlyn and Miss Desmond. They had plenty of time to grow quite intimate in the drawing-room while they were waiting for Francis, who came in, flushed with a hurried toilet, at ten minutes to eight. He had been absent upon one of his mysterious errands during the whole afternoon.

Roderick Lowther was received very graciously by the two ladies, and cordially welcomed by Mr. Trelethlyn. One of Mr. Trelethlyn's pompous retainers opened the drawing-room door soon after and announced:

"Mr. and Miss Grunderson."

"Egad!" thought Harcourt Lowther, "there's the solution of my difficulty. Why not Miss Grunderson? Miss Grunderson is an heiress, or ought to be, if there is stability in any part of the commercial universe."

A young lady with a very rosy face, a young lady decidedly inclined to that quality which in the fair sex is elegantly entitled embonpoint, a young lady who was surrounded by surging flounces of pink arrophane, dotted sheet with more pink rosebuds and larger full-blown roses than were ever worn by any young lady with a judicious recollection of the sweeps on Hayday, bounced into the room, and bounced up to Mrs. Trelethlyn, while an elderly gentleman, who was evidently the young lady's papa, beamed mildly at the company across the enormous expanse of embroidered sheet front and black trousers.

That ponderous Mr. Grunderson had begun life as a shadow-painter. The art-world of civilization, however, had contrived to push Mr. Grunderson's gardens off the face of the earth, and in so doing had struck a Pactolian fountain of wealth for Grunderson's pocket. The wealth poured in upon him with a rapidity which was like nothing but a baby tap, and the shadow-painter found himself, at fifty years of age, proprietor of ground rents that made him a millionaire. He had only one child, a daughter, who had been educated for some fifty pounds a-year, at a seminary for young ladies, in which she had been cruelly snubbed on account of her father's calling, and where no one would attend to revenge herself on the compulsions of her childhood youth by the splendor of her womanhood.

But there was a red worn womanly heart beating under those rose-buds and flounces, and here a bad more meaning in them than the raptures of enthusiastic young ladies are apt to have. She watched herself most affectionately in that she Mrs. Trelethlyn was fain to forget, or at any rate to forgive the occasional lapses in her grammar, the unpleasant warmth of her fat little hands, which always came dropping down on the hands of her companion.

CHAPTER XXIX.—HARCOURT GATHERS HIS FIRST ROSES.

FRANCIS TRELETHLYN'S conduct for the last few weeks had quite baffled his friend's penetration. The Cornishman had grown suddenly preoccupied and reserved. He might stand by one in the haunts of the Bohemians, for Harcourt Lowther took care that he should not easily extricate himself from the hands that had allured him to be twisted about him; but Francis, always unwilling to be led into the scenes where he found no pleasure, and where he once revolted as a cox, and Harcourt Lowther found it very difficult to play the game he wanted to play without showing his hand.

While waiting a note a this friends desk one night in early April, he observed a letter in course of a cottage, the sum total of which came to little more than three hundred pounds.

"Ah," exclaimed Mr. Lowther, "I think I have fallen upon the clue to the mystery. We will go and look at Mr. Tredethlyn's furnished cottage."

He rested his elbows upon a table at the gentlemanaire, where he found Roderick intolerably at his ease in the society of the three ladies. There was the solemn approach made for a meeting in Maud's roomy box at Covent Garden, to which Mrs. Trelethlyn had taken a little affectionate fancy, who clung to her with peculiar fondness to-day, and then the two gentlemen took their departure, Harcourt to look in at the "Cave of Harmony" and the "St. James's," Harcourt to bury pastmate—or rather haunch-oak haste—to the Waterloo terminus, whence he took the train for Richmond.

The party in Mrs. Trelethlyn's opera-box that evening was a very pleasant one. Whatever business had taken Harcourt Lowther to Richmond must have been tolerably satisfactory in its result, for that gentleman's manners were more than usual as he stood behind Maude's chair in the shadow of the crimson curtain, talking to her under cover of the loud conversation Harcourt and grand orchestral effects which Heyrotzer must have thought peculiarly favorable to confidential conversation. Miss Grunderson was gorgeous in thirty guineas' worth of the moire antique en la Pompadour, and exhibited a very liberal way of face and artificial flowers upon her plump little person. Her diamond carrings were the largest in the house—handsome, Harcourt had confessed that a straw-colored tint, which the connoisseur repudiates, pervaded the gems that the market-gardener had bought for his daughter—size, rather than purity or water, being the quality for which Mr. Grunderson admired her diamonds. Nothing could be more striking than the contrast between Maude's simple toilet of white silk and opals and Rose Grunderson's splendor.

But Miss Grunderson was very happy this evening, for the delightful Roderick condescended to talk to her, and his brother was engrossed by Mrs. Trelethlyn.

"With the exception of public characters," remarked the elder gentleman to Harcourt, "I don't think I was ever really in love until now."

And thus it fell out that when Mrs. Trelethlyn said in the course of the evening that she was going to spend the following day at Twickenham, Rose gave such broad hints about the loveliness of the weather, and the delights of suburban scenery, that good-natured Maude promised to take her down for a long afternoon among the roses in the little old garden which was part of her own happy youth had been idled away.

"And Scipyon is to be permitted to join Arcadia, ladies?" demanded Harcourt; "and will the halls and mallets be considered out of place upon the lawn by the river?"

This was quite enough for Miss Grunderson, who cried out directly that of all things in the world she adored croquet, and that "par" Pall height her a set of Crowey's mask magnetic walnut-wood balls and mallets. There were three sets in the drawing-room, called her intelligent parent par, in spite of their half-dozen annual accounts which he had paid for the young lady's education.

"Does Tredethlyn go with you to-morrow?" asked Harcourt Lowther, irritably.

He had been very thoughtful for the last few minutes.

"No," Maude answered rather sadly. "I asked Frank to drive me down in the mail phaeton, but he told me he was going a little way out of town on business."

She was thinking how very great a change had come to pass since her husband had been in the sulking state, only to appear to follow wherever she pleased to lead him. Now there was no quarrel, no sotto! misunderstanding between them. Frank was quite a wide breach, as if they had agreed to separate after a long series of domestic battles.

The next day was one of the brightest in a brilliant July, and Mrs. Tredethlyn's shell-shaped barouche was seldom before the pondents in her coed portico at eleven o'clock. France had left house half an hour before on foot, for that mysterious expedition a little way of town which he took so frequently now. Maude and Julia came downstairs at a little after eleven, and Miss Grundemore signed up the stone steps two minutes afterwards, with the basest homes and the pinkest parasol in London.

"How do you like the new contrast?" she inquired, twirling the pink parasol triumphantly, when she had greeted her chances and friends to the best of her ability, on the front seat of Mrs. Tredethlyn's carriage. "I remember, when I was at school, Julia and I were together very much of bad taste, but now they're quite de rigger. Ness pas her say jolli dong sy'ptite embonpoint," she mumbled this last triumph, hurrying into French.

"Ungt-huit shillings, ma chère, neza pas tres expensif, et le bonnetier ne voulait pas prendre un sir sous de moins, quoique j'ai le marchandé comme un fuif," she added, with a slap-dash rendering of the language which she imagined to be French.

Yes, it had come to this, Maude Tredethlyn deeply felt her husband's palpable avoidance of her: so deeply that she had absolutely devised she had been just a little inclined to despise him; but now that the treasure of an honest man's love seemed to have slipped from her keeping, there was to the consciousness that it was a treasure, and that she had need to be unhappy in the loss of it, lewd that it gave to every woman to possess. She sickened at the thought of the wealth which her marriage had given her, now that it had become valueless in the eyes of the giver. Was it gone, that devoted affection which she had held so lightly when it was hers to throw away?

It was about four o'clock, and the afternoon had lapsed into a sultry, sleepy brightness, that was almost oppressive in that green country lane beside the river, when the two gentlemen suggested the water.

"Of all things in the world the most delightful," screamed Miss Grundemore.

Harcourt placed Miss Tredethlyn and Julia Desmond in one boat, and to another descended Miss Grundemore, with more small shrieks of terror and tremulous admiration, and a greater display of flannel boots and embroidered flounces, than were absolutely necessary to the embarkation.

While Rodenick rowed his fair companion swiftly past the verdant bank, Harcourt in his boat drift slowly down with the current, only plying the oars now and then in the intervals of his discourse.

After a time he unshipped his oars and proposed a stroll in the Petersham meadows. Maude looked at her watch; it was a quarter to five, and Mr. Hilbury always dined at half-past seven, so there was plenty of time for a stroll across those verdant meadows, and Mrs. Tredethlyn, knowing the interval to be one of seachess, had only to choose in wasting it in the way or in some other fashion. Harcourt and his wife, therefore, first assisted the two ladies to disembark, gave his cock into the custody of one of the lounging watermen at the water-side steps, and then strolled on with his two companions into the meadows leading towards Petersham.

"I wish there would hey a nice old house down here. I should he near papa here, and all my old friends. In town I seem to know everybody, and yet I have only a single friend."

There was a rustic bench in the lime through which they were walking as Maude said this. The two ladies sat down to rest for a few minutes, and Harcourt Lowther took out his cigar case.

"I shall leave you and your companion to rest a cigarette," he said, "and then I will take you back to the water-side by a still prettier road, if you like."

He went away at a leisurely pace, lighting his cigar as he went; but he walked a good deal faster after he was out of Maude Tredethlyn's ken, and he was flushed with heat when he returned after a quarter of an hour's absence.

"Now, ladies," he said, "if we are to be Mr. Hilbury waiting for his dinner, it is high time for us to go back to the boat."

Maude and Julia rose, and the little party strolled into the road at the end of the lane, in the straggling order usual to people who walk for their own pleasure in a country village. Mrs. Tredethlyn's white umbrella was a little way ahead of the companions, when Harcourt Lowther laid his gloved hand lightly upon Julia's shoulder.

She looked up at him, startled by the gesture.

"You have had some reason to complain of her friends, Miss Hillary and Francis Tredethlyn," he said. "I am going to give you your revenge."

Julia stared in amazement at the speaker; but he did not wait to be interrogated.

"Come, Mrs. Tredethlyn," he said "your papa will have to wait for his dinner unless you walk a little faster."

He had not much reason to complain of Maude, who had been ahead of him until this moment, but he hurried her along the dusty road until, at a spot where it crossed to the river, he stopped suddenly, pointing to a cottage garden, seen through the iron rails of a high, old-fashioned gate set in a frame-work of clematis.

"Look at that, Mrs. Tredethlyn! Isn't it a pretty picture?"

It was a little rustic tableau composed of two figures grouped under a mulberry tree—a woman with a delicate face and soft brown hair, touched here and there with a glimmer of gold, seated on a rustic bench, and looking up at a man who leaned against the trunk of the tree. It was only a glimpse of this picture which Maude caught between the iron scroll-work of the gate, but she saw quite enough.

The man was Francis Tredethlyn.

"My God!" exclaimed Harcourt Lowther, in an audible whisper, "it is France!"

Maude looked at him with a vague alarm in her face, which had grown almost as white the unhealthy white that it had been. Harcourt's whisper had frightened her a hundred fold more than the sight of her husband, as home in that unknown garden with a woman she had never seen or heard of.

"Who is that lady?" she asked, when they had passed the house. "Do you know her, Mr. Lowther? You know all my husband's associates much better than I do."

He tried to speak quite calmly, but failed miserably in the effort. Harcourt's whisper had expressed much.

"Yes, I do not know the lady," he answered, gravely.

I think you had better make no inquiries about her. Mr. Tredethlyn did not tell you that he was to spend the day at Petersham?"

"No; he only said that he was going a little way out of town.

"Then in that case it will be better for you to leave him to explain his own actions, unless you have made no arrangement for meeting him here, and do not know the lady."

Maude did not answer him just then. She walked on a little faster than before, and Harcourt kept by her side, looking furtively every now and then at the pale face that the tremulous lower lip. He could see that Mrs. Tredethlyn was profoundly agitated, and that she was trying to conceal her agitation. He could see this, and he was determined to make her speak, and speak freely.

"I am waiting, Mrs. Tredethlyn, to suffer in silence," he thought. "This kind of trouble is new to her, and she will cry out presently."

Mr. Lowther knew Maude's fault in his estimate of Maude's heroism. She spoke to him when they were a few paces from John, whose face was lighted by a leak of triumph under her gauzy veil.

"You say you do not know that lady. You must at least know her name, Mr. Lowther."

This was said in a tone of almost piteous entreaty.

"Upon my honor, no," Harcourt answered gravely.

There was a pause for some moments. They were in one of the meadows by this time, nearing the water's edge, Julia still in the rear, and Maude still walking very fast, as if the habit of most people to walk under the influence of agitation.

All at once Maude turned to Harcourt Lowther and laid her hand upon his arm.

"Tell me what it all means," she cried—"tell me the worst, however bad it is. I know that you are losing something more than time by this manner just now that there is some horrible meaning in Frank's presence in that garden with that woman."

"My dear Mrs. Tredethlyn, you ask me to interfere in a matter which I have no right to approach. It may be everything or nothing where your husband goes—when he associates with. I have not been brought into such close intimacy as to give my best to keep him clear of dangerous acquaintances and dangerous amusements—still for your sake. I can tell you that I will endeavor to know him out of mischief, and may have regretted the natural tendencies of his character—always for your sake. Now, if you wish me to go back to him with him, I had good reason for being sorry when you married him—on my own account. Of late I have been still more sorry for your sake."

Maude looked at him, white and trembling.

"Speak to me plainly, Mrs. Tredethlyn cried passionately, "or I shall think that cowardly and ask my husband himself for an explanation. Perhaps that would be best. He has a better right to explain his conduct than any one else."

She walked a few paces from her companion, and Harcourt Lowther followed her, and caught her gently by the arm.

"Will Francis Tredethlyn tell you the truth if you question him?" he asked. "My dear Mrs. Tredethlyn, how could you endure the scandale of such a scene as must ensue if you went back to that house, and confronted your husband in the presence of that woman?"

"Why should there be a scene, or any scandale? She may be the wife or daughter of some friend of my husband's. Have I any right to imagine something horrible because I see Frank quietly engaged in a stroll with a lady? It was only your manner that frightened me."

"It is very sorry that I have been so foolish. Let us drop the subject. Only—take my advice—don't go back to that house."

"Why should I not, if husband is innocent—as I am sure he is?"

Mr. Lowther shrugged his shoulders.

"Because it is an unpleasant thing to intrude where one is not invited," he answered.

Mrs. Tredethlyn turned upon him fiercely. He had never seen the woman he loved in a passion until this moment, and though he had so much else to think about, he could not help pausing for a moment to think how beautiful she looked with that new light in her eyes—that feverish glow so suddenly kindled in the cheeks that had just now been deadly pale.

"I will not let the matter drop," she cried. "You are keeping some hideous secret hidden from me. I know you are. I could not be mistaken in your tone just now when you saw Francis in that garden. If there was no harm in his being there, why should you express such amazement? Harcourt Lowther, we were friends once, and you affect to be my friend now. If you are what you pretend to be, tell me the meaning of my husband's conduct."

"You love him very much, Maude, to feel his conduct so deeply."

She was too agitated to notice that her old lover had called her by her christian name. He had, perhaps, been scarcely aware of it himself.

"You know that I love him well enough to love him, he repeated, bitterly; "and yet I should have scarcely thought it possible you could care for that sort of a person."

"He is my husband," answered Maude, "and I have a right to be angry if he does me any wrong."

"I acknowledge your right to be as angry as you please; I am sorry to see you are so agitated. I am very sorry you consented to walk this way."

"Will you tell me the truth? I have appealed to you as an old friend. Shabby as I am, I would not believe in you as a friend unless you speak plainly to-day."

"I can say that, you oblige me to speak. Will you take my arm and walk up and down by the hedge yonder. I see people coming into the meadow, and we look rather conspicuous standing just here."

Mrs. Tredethlyn accepted the offered arm. Harcourt Lowther walked with her some moments while they strolled slowly under the shelter of the tall hawthorn hedge. He was waiting until Maude should have recovered somewhat from her alarm, and be in a condition to appreciate the full value of what he had to tell her.

"It would be going over very old ground, and awakening very bitter recollections—on my part, at least—if I began at last, in a subdued and passive tone, "were I to tell you what I thought of your marriage with Francis Tredethlyn. All I could do now is to say that you might not be entirely miserable with the man you married—to my mind, the man of all others least adapted to make you a happy husband. Another man might have been good enough to keep aloof from you and your husband after that unhappy marriage. I was so mad as to imagine that you would accept the friendship of my rival, in the belief that I might save the vessel in which you had embarked, from sport of the storm. Forgive me for a little shred of the pride hay from which you seiled, with all the stereotyped prejudices of a Pharisee flying and grain living. I have saved you from a good deal; but I have not been able to change your husband's nature, and he has taken his own way in spite of me."

"What do you mean?" Maude demanded, breathlessly.

"I speak, and will not, enter into the details of Francis Tredethlyn's life for the last twelve-months. There are places in London whose names I have never heard, whose life—places whose very existence might never be known to honest people if men did not write about them in the newspapers and magazines. Archives of those places your husband has been conspicuous from the first week of his return from the villare where you found him. He has been known to play at dinners given up at that hotel yonder to women whose costume is an extravagant copy of yours, and who is everything except their dress and fortune from yonas entirely as darkness differs from light; and Francis Tredethlyn has been conspicuous among the dinner-givers ever since he has had a fortune to squander. So long as he was amused by open riots and debauchery, I cherished a lurking hope that custom would bring weariness, and that the very monotony of those poisonous pleasures would render them unattractive. And then you moved also, that your loveliness, your purity, rendered all the more obvious by contrast with the women he associated with, led to his desiring here him back to your side. How could I think otherwise than this?—I who had loved and lost you!"

It never occurred to Mrs. Tredethlyn that these were the very last words that Harcourt Lowther should have spoken to her at this moment, above all other moments. It seemed as if she scarcely heard them after the first few sentences—scarcely had heard her old love's frequent utterance of her christian name.

"I think my husband loved me once," she murmured, in a low sorrowful voice. "He was so noble in his conduct—so generous to my father."

"My poor girl! considered Harcourt, in the supreme compassion, "how should you know the difference between a good man's generosity and a contemptible fellow's? How should you know which happens to be the fancy of the moment? There are men who will give as great a price for a picture as ever Correggio painted, and who would have won you for his wife; but you would scarcely call a man's generosity generous because he extravagantly as a Raffaelo or a Murillo, at Christie's. I am so creature in this world so selfish as a profligate man."

Maude turned sick and cold to the very heart as Mr. Lowther said this.

A profligate man! The horrible word wounded her like the stroke of a dagger. The generosity she had believed in was a sham. The noble nature which had commanded her regard and esteem—even when it could not win her love—had never existed except for own imagination. She had been grossly betrayed, humiliated; while in her school-girl simplicity she had been lamenting her unworthiness of a devoted husband's love. She had been taught for money like a slave in some Oriental marketplace, when she had imagined herself a free sacrifice offered as the recompense of a sacred duty.

She did not speak; but looking at her face, Harcourt Lowther saw that his words had gone home.

But Mr. Lowther had not finished yet.

"I thought I could win you back your husband, Maude, and restore him to you a better man," he said; "that I soon discovered how futile such a hope was. I have been by his side in scenes that were horribly repugnant to my own nature, in order that I might hold him back from the verge of deeper guilt than those into which he had already fallen. Within the last few months I have known that he kept a secret from me, and I knew that it must be a disgraceful one. Only a few days ago it came to my knowledge that he had lately furnished a house somewhere in the suburbs. His game was a close one—those mysterious absences, those journeys on business a little way out of town, about which your husband had been so curious, the visits of Francis Tredethlyn's cabman to not furnish houses from benevolent motives. I had no means of knowing where the house was—how little other people knew that it was a bachelor's hood, or that accident should lead our footsteps to the very threshold. Mrs. Tredethlyn, you shall not wring another word from me. I am sorry that you have tempted me to tell you so much."

exclaimed Mr. Harcourt, who had said all he wanted to say.

It was a long time before Maude answered him; and then she said, very slowly, and with a painful effort:

"I thank you—for having told me the truth. It is always best to know the truth."

CHAPTER XXXI.—ROSA'S REVELATIONS.

THEY walked slowly back to the side, where Julia was sitting as patiently as it was in her to be that monumental patience of whom the poet has told us.

"Julia, dear," Maude said, wearily, as they walked to the river-side, "would you mind going home in the boat, as soon as we can get to the carriage? I have such an intolerable headache, that I'm sure I shall be quite unfit to dine with papa."

"I am sorry, dear," Lowther said; I have kept you waiting an unreasonable time," and Julia looked, looking at her sweet.

"Not at all," replied Miss Desmond; "I rather like waiting."

Roderick Lowther and Miss Grundemore were loitering by the little landing-place; the young lady's showy draperies pre-Raffaelite in the many edges which she exhibited against the hot lime trees.

"Oh, you darling Mrs. Tredethlyn!" exclaimed Rosa; "I thought you never were coming! If your pa is half as particular about his dinner as mine is, won't he be cross with us all? It's close upon seven o'clock."

Maude looked piteously at Harcourt Lowther. He understood that appealing glance.

"Mrs. Tredethlyn has a frightful headache," he said; "she has asked me to request you to make a hroiling sun," he said, "and then kegaling her to the shade of the trees, and I have to be horribly whiped for my stupidity. If you have any message for your friend's health, Miss Grundemore, you will have the pleasure of dining with Mr. Hilbury, and get her home as quietly as you can."

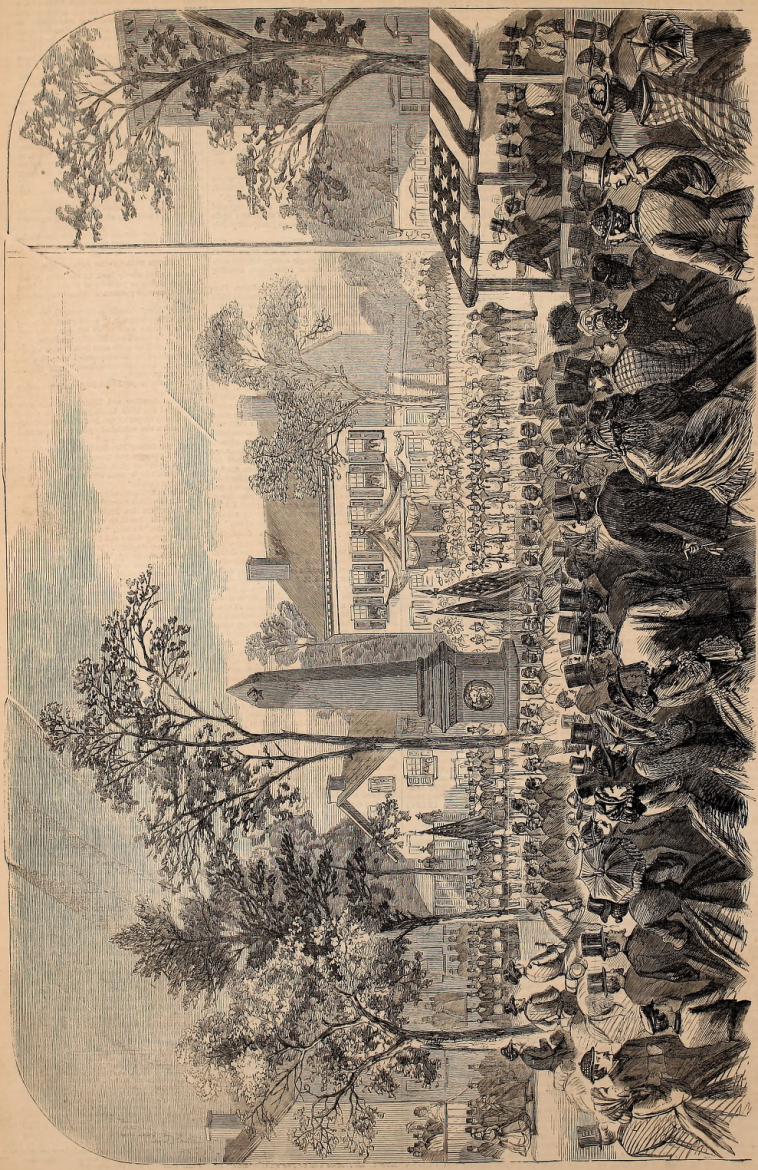
Rosa Grunderon might be silly, but she was by no means stupid, and, looking at Maude's pallid face, she saw that something more than a headache had caused the change in her friend. She saw that there was some dreadful secret in the air, about the brother of the man she adored, shaped itself into a positive dislike.

"That Mr. Lowther is the most horrid thing to annoy her," thought Miss Grunderon; "and I hate him."

Lionel Hillary was in the drawing-room when the water-party returned to the Cedars; but he received his daughter's message that she was too tired and too ill to dine with him, and escorted her to her carriage as soon as it was ready for her.

"It was foolish of you to go on the water in the hottest part of the day, darling," he said; "and I wish you would give a little too much in town; but the season will soon be over, and I suppose you will be leaving London."

"I think so, papa," Maude had ever yet confessed had been so bitter as that which had come upon her that day, the humiliation, the unutterable horror of that discovery made on the summer sunshine, amidst the perfume of flowers, the pleasant voices of a sylvan way up in the warm blue sky. She did not love her husband; and the agony which crushed her heart during those few minutes of agitation was due to no selfish feelings to wounded pride rather than to betrayed affection. At least this was what she said to herself when she was alone, and she was free to indulge her brow, those sneering remarks of Mr. Lowther's about her love for such a man as Francis Tredethlyn.



"I do believe he loved me once, let Harcourt Lowther say what he will; and he was wilfully generous to my father—and now he is a thief altogether, and devotes himself to some horrible vice—and Harcourt Lowther, whose whole class were not particularly sequential this example.

She meditated upon so much as she knew of the life that Francis had led since the close of his honeymoon. His fate hours, his frequent absences, all seemed to confirm Harcourt's account of his associates and his pursuits.

Yes, everything combined to prove the miserable truth. She was a neglected wife—abandoned by the man who had once sworn that she was dearer than ever bowed beneath the supreme dominion of love.

A RECENT for a new kind of indestructible ink is given in one of the German scientific journals, which is said to be very good. The ink is said to be composed of 20 grains of sugar dissolved in 30 grains of water, to which are said to be added a few drops of concentrated sulphuric acid. Upon heating this mixture the sugar becomes carbonized by the acid, and with applied to the paper, it leaves a coating of carbon which cannot be washed out. This ink is rendered more permanent by the accompanying action of the tar itself upon the paper, and also makes it secure from action of chemical agents.

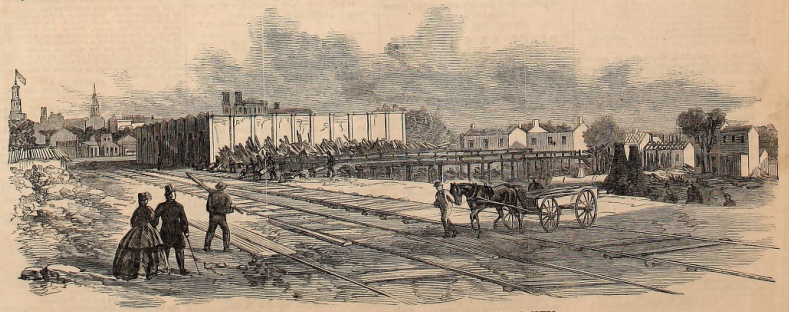
ROBBERY OF RICHMOND GOLD.

A FEW days since two officers of the Richmond banks, whose assets were removed from that city upon its evacuation by the rebels in April, started from Washington, Ga., on their return to Richmond with $136,000 in specie, under guard.

At the end of the first day's journey they encamped on the grounds of Mrs. Morse, 16 miles from Washington and three from the Savannah river. The officers retired, and the guard fell asleep. About midnight, a party of 20 mounted men, who were evidently aware of the value of the train, suddenly dashed upon it, and the guards surrendered without firing a gun or making the slightest show of resistance. The freebooters immediately went to work, bursting open the specie kegs and helping themselves to the glittering contents. One fellow, it is related, had a large leathern haversack which he filled; but just as he was mounting his horse the straps gave way, and the precious metal fell clinking to the ground. He eagerly scraped up the gold and sand, leaving a number of pieces, and placing the coin in a bag rode off. The next morning a negro teamster found 51 pieces scattered in profusion all about the ground.



Some $100,000 were stolen, leaving about $150,000. With this amount the bank officers journeyed on, safer but wiser men.

THE UNION CARDS
Have already revolutionized the card trade, and still the work is only commenced. So great has been the demand for them that the manufacturers have scarcely been able to supply one grade, without attempting the manufacture of other qualities. By the increased facilities which have been obtained, through great expense, they are now prepared to fill all orders on the day received, and for the exportation of all who favor the EAGLE, SHIELD, STAR and FLAG of the UNION in the specially invited.

Of how much more significance are our National Emblems than the lifeless, meaningless characters used to designate the suits of cards! Kings of Spades, Queens and Jacks are played out! Clubs and Spades are used!

DECLINE remove Kings; the Genius of LIBERTY scorns Queens; and the MIGHT is MAY to any Jacks Christendom. In order to secure your investment in the grand circulation of the UNION CARDS, the following prices have been established, at which you will be supplied:

2 Packs, to send by mail, postpaid, for - $1 00

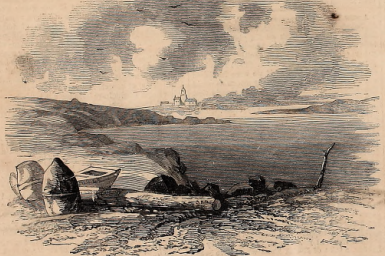
FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 511—Vol. XX.] NEW YORK, JULY 15, 1865. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly, 13 Weeks $1 0

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.



The magnificent enterprise of extending telegraphic communication across the Atlantic Ocean bids fair to be completed very soon. The public will remember the previous attempt, which, after a brief and partial success, resulted so unfortunately. This time additional skill has been brought into operation, and the experience of the past is expected to lead the way to success.

On the morning of June the 1st, the scientific corps, chosen to select a site for the British terminus of the great cable, left London for Valentia bay, on the west coast of Ireland. The corps consists of the Hon. Cyrus W. Field, of New York, on behalf of the Atlantic Telegraph Company; Mr. C. F. Varley, Assistant Electrician to the same company; Mr. John Tremble, Engineer to the Telegraph and Maintenance Company; Mr. B. Dawson Wardlock, Superintendent in Ireland of the Atlantic Telegraph Company; Mr. W. Q. Ansell, Superintendent Engineer and Inspector to the International Electric Telegraph Company; the Knight of Kerry, a gentleman who has taken great interest in the project; and our Special Artist, with one or two newspaper correspondents. The party passed through the counties of Dublin, Kildare, Kings, Queens, Kilkenny, Tipperary, Limerick, Waterford and Cork, and passed the beautiful lakes of Killarney, reaching Reenard Point, extending into the harbor of Valentia, at eleven o'clock at night. Doulas bay, the place where the shore end of the cable of 1858 was fastened, is near this place. Knightstown, Valentia island, is selected for the place on this occasion, a pretty little village, cosily resting at the foot of huge cliffs on the shore.

We present this week some spirited sketches by our Special Artist, who was present during this trip, and will add on the Great Eastern to witness the laying of the cable.

THE CORPUS CHRISTI CELEBRATION.

To the active, bustling American, French Canada is but a part of Europe of the middle ages. Its clergy, its convents, hospitals, its social life, its content and freedom from ambition, are points worthy of study. Among the objects most striking to an American is the Corpus Christi celebration which took place this year in Quebec, on the 11th of June. This procession formed to commemorate the burial of Christ commenced to move early in the morning from the parish church, and wended its way through the principal thoroughfares of the city. Triumphal arches were raised along the route, and trees were planted to shade the streets through which the procession passed. The colleges, with their faculties and students, the aldermen in their curious dresses, with their pages—all bearing appropriate banners, and sometimes recipients of British favors lead the line. The Host was borne beneath a rich canopy by the bishop or some high dignitary, in a cope of cloth of gold, with a priest on either hand in a rich chasuble. Other priests in chasubles of rich stuff, or simple surplices, precede, and a band of young acolytes in gay satin cassocks, with flags, censers and baskets of flowers, attend from time to time, and while the flags were bowed in respect, the censers were swung and flowers were thrown in the air. The most Rev. Peter Flavian Turgeon, D. D., of Quebec, whose portrait we present to our readers in this present number, presided over the Corpus Christi ceremonies this year.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS OF FRANK LESLIE'S

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold

Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received for it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by BRADY.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have received the highest national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his staff to Mrs. Lincoln. This elegant plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The second gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

NEW YORK, JULY 15, 1865.

All Communications, BOOKS for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

The trial of the conspirators in Washington, at the time we write, has been concluded. As regards Atzerott, his counsel presented a statement or confession, acting forth that he had conspired with Booth, but had not done what was assigned to him to do, namely, to murder Vice-president Johnson. His counsel insisted that having committed no overt act, nor been a criminal except in intent, he could not be held accountable before the law. He claimed, in his behalf, that he was a low, cowardly wretch, promising great things and buoying himself up with stimulants, but when the hour to strike arrived, skulking away, and leaving his accomplices to their fate. If this plea, in its technicalities, shall save the scoundrel, then we may relinquish our native ideas of justice. We believe, however, as conspiracy to defraud is a punishable offence, conspiracy to murder must have its penalty. This plea in behalf of Harold was unquestionably the same, viz., that he did nothing beyond helping Booth to escape. It is no denial that he was privy to the plot. The same exculpatory plea, however, is that offered in behalf of Payne, whose real name is Powell, the man who made the assault on Mr. Seward. That it is not as frivolous to be denied, and his counsel is compelled to excuse him on the ground that his conduct was only a consequence of his devotion and sacrifices—that although the son of a clergyman, the standard of morality in Florida, the cradle of the slave system, is such that murder is regarded only as a venial offence in general, and sometimes a duty! The response of the South, "the barbarism of slavery," had made the prisoner a murderer, and therefore he was not accountable for the attempts to kill Mr. Seward. The argument of the counsel for stating that the accused had been thus educated, by the unavoidable influence of Southern social habits, as the most prominent character. He says, among other things, that "Payne was trained in a slave community, where it was the custom to defend the honor of every lady in meeting-houses, at political gatherings and in family places, where it was the practice to fight and burn men who preached against the institutions, and to hunt fugitives with bloodhounds, and whose code helped him to his crime."

This arraignment of Southern society is unquestionably true—although it is a poor defence for Payne—and attests the value of slavery and the safety of Northern communities, that the system producing such educational effects, should be prohibited from every portion of the South. No vestige of it should be left, either in statute or constitution. Nowhere else could such a defence from legal skill with any effect be found.

THE views of Mr. Lincoln upon the questions before the country must have, and deservedly, a solemn weight. Upon the reorganization of Louisiana, his friend, Mr. Michael Hahn, then elected Governor, as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, March 13, 1864.

HON. MICHAEL HAHN:

My dear Sir—I congratulate you on having fixed your name in history as the first free State Governor of Louisiana, save you accept a merely temporary position, which, among other things, will probably deline the public estimate of you.

I warmly suggest, for your private consideration, whether some practical mode, to which you can be reconciled, may not be devised for the benefit of the colored man the highest privilege of citizenship.

Next to the views of the late President, those of Gen. Grant must have most weight in the country. According to the Chicago Tribune, Gen. Grant thinks it a mistake to declare that the loyal blacks in the South shall not be allowed to vote. Aside from the natural repugnance of the people to any such authority can confer or withhold the franchise—whether it be Congress or the States—the measure may assume the shape of a political necessity.

The government and people may have to choose between keeping the colored man in slavery and at an expense of $100,000,000 a year to the taxpayers, to support the white minority in the South, and giving the white rebel the option of abandoning the blacks, and thereby enabling them to support the white loyalists. Gen. Grant believes that the sufferage question may take this form.

At the very moment the New York correspondent of the Chicago Times was exciting to that journal, the ability of Kirby Smith to prolong the war in Texas for years, the London Times, the leading organ of England, this wonderful general, with his ability, for the first discovered by this veracious correspondent, was "hiding under the cover of a pine thicket" in Florida, in the garb of a woman! All the more astounding as the London Times and its correspondent had been "the leading influence?" We hope they have suffered roundly. It may cure them of their absurd confidence in "the leading organ."

The American Republic, which was supposed to be absorbed in trade and agriculture, overcome by wealth and prosperity, incapable of the efforts and sacrifices which are required for war—this republic has already shown itself upon the battle-fields, the rival of the republics of Rome and Greece. Like the Grecian republics, it has already had its two Servilius's—as Persian and its Peloponnesian war. The war of 1774 to 1782, which created its nationality, and the war 1861 to 1865, which has put an end to slavery, has engraved its name in the first class among the records of martial glory. —London Spectator.

"ARELIGANATION?"—This is the appalling word with which every step towards investing the negro with civil rights is met, and supposed to be utterly confounded. And that, too, in face of the fact, that about all the mixing of the blooded the black and white races has occurred in the South, and was the direct consequence of the relations of those races as fixed by slavery. Few white men in Indiana, many natives, and a hundred years only one white woman is known to have done so; but the two races possess absolutely equal privileges; the richest can neither be served, nor forbidden, nor interfered with in any way whatever. If it is in him to get to the top he gets to the top, and the native member of council takes precedence of the highest white in the empire not belonging to that body.

A CERTAIN Dr. Smith, of England, has just published a "Practical Dinner Book," which, we are sure, will secure for him a monument, to be raised by penny contributions from the great fraternity of Cookdom. For there, in two, four-meal schedules he provided daily, and at two at least of those half a pint of milk should be given to each child, with unlimited bread and butter. The dinner should consist of hot fresh meat, with soup or broth when the meat is boiled. "The quantity of meat should be moderate," and, in order that the pupils may be encouraged to ask again, it is better, in large schools, that separate joints be distributed to each table, so that one shall be near each knot of pupils, and each pupil be specially invited to put his or her separate plate forward. Besides this, there should be plenty of fresh vegetables and a constant variety of puddings! With such diet assured, one might not object to be "a boy again."

HISTORY OF INDEPENDENCE.—The South Carolina delegation, which recently waited on the President, to discuss the subject of "reconstruction," very modestly asked that the government should recommend to the people a day of fasting prayer, which amount, according to their calculation, to about two hundred million dollars.

A NEW English astronomer, Mr. R. Proctor, of St. John's College, Cambridge, has just published an elaborate book on the planet Saturn, believes Saturn's rings to be not continuous bodies, either solid or fluid, but a multitude of small planets, grouped like a head necklace round his equatorial regions, just as if we were to crowd all the fish we could get into a canny moone as would span the whole earth. Mr. Proctor asserts that this hypothesis explains completely the whole phenomena of the case than any other. This supposition somehow gives a larger idea of the opulence of the universe in worlds than any other known fact. To keep such a multitude of little worlds strung close together round one planets proves the Almighty's having a more vivid impression on the mind than many times the same number of fixed stars distributed over the infinitude of space.

THE head of the mass of the Southern people, and of most persons naturalised here, towards the negro is pale by the side of the hatred once borne by all Europe towards the Jew, for if he was, as that had, the support of a religious instinct. It is not a hundred years since, in any country of Europe, a man of this blood would have been considered a disgrace, and to-day there is not a free country in Europe, except Spain, in which a man of that blood is not eagerly chosen as representative of the people; in Austria, Prussia and France the spread of Jewish intellect exercises a marked effect on politics.

NOW that slavery is dead, if the negro be not industrious, or accumulating, or inventive, then he ought not to have, and certainly will not have, the right to vote. And, of course, any man of this similarly disqualified white man. He must find his place for himself, and, provided that the law protects him, he can have no right to complain of the social disadvantage of color than of the social disadvantage of short stature. All he can ask, or should ask, is to be a clear field and no favor, and that once obtained he must reach his goal for himself. But he must be protected by the law, and by the Church, as he is by the new constitution of Tennessee, from giving his testimony in courts of law against a white man. Jesus will not be apt to give undue weight to a black man's testimony. The danger would all be the other way.

THE finances of France are in a bad way. The expenditure, under the empire, have risen $100,000,000 above the receipts, and become hopelessly out $70,000,000. There is now an annual deficit of $30,000,000.

A CANADIAN correspondent of the Tribune says that Canada cannot avoid a serious increase in the interest of manifest destiny. Before this visit I neither thought or cared much about Canadian affairs, and now I see that it is plainly written in the sky. Public sentiment here is rapidly crystalizing in its favor, and a few years will give us the peaceful annexation of the magnificent valley of the St. Lawrence, with the North Pole for our boundary. The price is not to be sneered at; a great country, a great land of forests, numerous mines of copper and lead on Lake Superior, and of gold near Quebec; no European crutches on the great lakes.

THE late English papers bring us the news of the death of Sir Henry Dymoke, the "Queen's Champion." The duty of the champion is this:—At the coronation banquet, armed cap-a-pie, he is to ride up Westminster Hall, while the sovereign is feasting there, and by proclamation of herald throw down his challenge to the whole world. The challenge given is to this effect: "If any man denies the monarch's title to the crown of the three realms, he (the champion) is ready to give him battle, and defend the royal claim in single combat." The challenge being given, which, of course, is now a mere form, the sovereign drinks to his champion, and sends him a golden goblet full of wine. The champion drain the wine, and keeps the goblet as his personal fee. The championship now falls to a clergyman, Rev. John Dymoke, who will be the eighteenth of the name who has borne the somewhat supererogatory office, since 1377. The last time the champion was called in "to perform" was at the coronation of George IV. in 1821.

THE World's Fair for 1867 is to be held in Paris, where a building will be erected capable of holding 200,000 persons. It is to be in the shape of a gigantic amphitheatre, but will be only one story in height. The adoption of this form of structure is rendered to be secure a large distribution of light and air throughout the whole of the interior, besides enabling objects to be rendered visible from any part of the view. The estimated cost of the building is about $4,000,000.

THE old-fashioned plan of presenting everybody to everybody at dinner is quite gone out, but a judicious hostess never omits the opportunity of making introductions where two people are likely to be interested in each other—if they have friends in the same state or city, or are interested in the same objects; in fact a very little thing is considered reason enough for an introduction.

A FRUGLISH work shortly to be published in Paris is one on "literary frauds," which will contain a list of the French writers whose published works under assumed names, viz., anagrams, asterisks, cryptonyms, initials, literary names, facetious or old pen-de-nom (a leather covered or not), apocryphal and supposed authors, plagiarists, and unfaithful publishers, during the last two centuries. No less than 50,000 entries are quoted.

A DAILY contemporary, after an elaborate calculation, reaches the conclusion that the total losses of the North by the consequence of war reach five thousand eight hundred millions of dollars, namely twenty-five hundred millions by loss of what was called slave property, nine hundred millions by ravages of war, nine hundred millions by loss of staple crops, five hundred millions of property sunk in Confederate bonds, and one thousand millions by what must hereafter be paid by the South to extinguish the principal and interest of national debt. This, of course, is a very rough estimate. Other items might have been included, involving millions more, but not less approximate. Enough as the estimate is, it falls short of the actual truth.

GEN. JEFF. THOMPSON, one of the most active of rebel officers, west of the Mississippi, had a bad name with the Federals, and now beats them. In an address to his late soldiers he tells them that there is no such thing as "peace, all peace is hostile to freedom," and that when they reach home they had better behave themselves in a civil and orderly manner. He says, "Let each man determine when he leaves the place, that he will go to his home, there to remain, and work hard each day to repair the damage that has been done by the war, and never go off his farm except to work or to hunt; if there be private quarrels between himself and neighbors, he had better go pack up, and hunt another neighborhood; and, if he will follow this advice, he will soon find the United States, he had better leave the country."

THERE is no country in which the want of harmony between the inhabitants and the place they inhabit is more felt than in America. In Europe there is room for not have been so. The red Indian, and even the trapper, were thoroughly appropriate to the boundless forests in which their wives have not yet been profaned by the axe of the emigrant. But the traveller in the western states now feels at every step that the natural glory of the country has departed, and no fresh associations have yet grown up in its place. The population is merely a heterogeneous fat that which remains on New York, or possibly of the peasantry of Galway or the Black Forest. In seeming to make no part of the land they love to the country in which it lives. The beauty of the virgin prairie is gone; it is half broken up into small agricultural holdings, or defiled by gigantic but still embryo cities. You reach outof a disfigured but not destroyed forest into a disfigured but not finished boundary of a town. You have neither wildness nor any full-grown civilization in its place. The scenery of the more settled parts is more and more dull. A watering-place is enough to destroy the charm of almost any scenery. Even the mere absence of the human beauty which has been lost sight of in the computation of the number of gallons of water and the number of feet over which they fall—is almost neutralized by the row of monster hotels. It is scarcely possible to taste from the stirring romance of a cigarette inn in a $\frac{1}{4}$ state of mind to enjoy the beauties of nature.

ON the 16th of February, 1864, the following resolution was presented to the rebel Congress by a Mr. Curry, of Alabama. Whether it was adopted or not we do not know, but it was made a special order for secret session. It derives importance shortly from the light of recent events, and is as follows:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Confederate States, the Senate concurring, That we do adhere to our opinion that the so-called Emancipation proclamation of the President of the United States, and the enlistment of negro slaves in several Federal armies now opposed to us, are not among the acts of legitimate warfare, but are property classed among such acts as the right to put to death prisoners of war without special cause, the right to use poisoned weapons and the right to assassinate, and if persisted in will justify the government in the adoption of measures of retaliation."

These publishers have issued a new work by Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "East Lynn," &c. The work is highly spoken of by the reading public.

TOWN GOSSIP.

HEAT, which has a host of disadvantages, has this one recommendation: it makes the readers of newspapers mercifully-disposed (from experience of their own necessary short-comings) towards the warm-weather infirmities of editors, reporters, et id genus omne. The man knows full well that he escapes as soon as possible from the "office" and seeks his "country" residence; the woman is conscious that she endeavors with all her might to do nothing—and generally succeeds in her attempt. Consequently, possessed of this consciousness, certainly neither the bearded nor the crinolined sex can have the bad heart to demand, in July, those elaborate articles which charm them in their papers so appropriately in December. Taking, then, the advantage of the season, we will follow in this resumé the advice of the immortal William—"Brief let me be!"

Outside of the heat there is not much to record. The great Assassination trial is over, much to the relief of everybody, saving very possibly the criminals themselves. President Johnson ardently devotes himself to reconstruction, while those who luckily are not presidents as zealously devote themselves to recreation.

Some speculative individuals intend to create on the banks of the North river, a sort of fairy garden, which shall combine the principle al fresco delights. These establishments have been common in England for the last 150 years, under the names of Ranelagh, Vauxhall, Surrey Zoological and Cremore Gardens. At these summer resorts there were music, concerts, dancing, ballets and theatrical performances, besides supper-rooms, and rustic bowers, where wine and refreshments were served by civil ganymedes. If such a mixed Arcadia is planted in our great city, the danger will be the irruption of those disturbers of all such places—the rowdies—a class which is never allowed to disturb in London the places we have named. Our police, however, is now becoming so efficient that even this turbulent element may be kept in terrorem. Vauxhall, on the banks of the Thames, about five miles above London Bridge, was, for nearly a century, the evening resort of all classes of English society, from the Prince of Wales to the costermonger in his holiday clothes. Quite a fairy scene appears when the boughs of the shady walks are hung with variegated lamps and Chinese lanterns.

As for business, there is none, saving in the ice-cream line and soda-water department—always including the Teutonic lager beer element. Fans sell well, we are told, and straw hats ditto. The city railroads drive a good trade, and the hack-drivers continue to turn an honest penny. But all our merchants and leading professional men have "vanished"—you will find them all over the world, saving New York; yet Broadway is full—full to overflowing; with city clerks and country cousins—God bless them—we mean the cousins; and the theatre managers doubtless re-echo our benediction, for were it not for our country cousins not a theatrical establishment in the city could sustain itself a week; but as it is they are all in a full tide of prosperity and perspiration. Oliver Twist suffers nightly at Wallack's; Jessie Brown suffers ditto at Mrs. Wood's; Miss Hosmer is pathetic at the Winter Garden; Maggie Mitchell goes "barefoot" at Niblo's; Mr. and Mrs. Watkins are at the Broadway, and we are at the end of our—Town Gossip.

THE PROFITS OF PETROLEUM.

THE "Petroleum fever," as an epidemic, is over, and every one who has the development of this great department of national wealth at heart, is glad of it. The sooner the bubble companies explode, and the sooner the petroleum business comes to be managed as all other legitimate kinds of business are managed, the better. Already several bubble companies have been punctured with the legal needle, and collapsed. But of the fact of the existence of great petroleum wealth, and of the fact that petroleum stands next to gold in its contribution to the aggregate wealth of the country, derived from mining, there is no doubt. It has made whole districts and numberless individuals rich, and will continue to do so. The day for mere speculators, however, is over. They have realised all the piles they can expect to reach through the public credulity, well manipulated with flaming prospectuses. It is now a question of digging, and the straightforward digger, guided by fair intelligence, is pretty sure to achieve his object.

The oil business, which was very much depressed by the floods of last spring, which filled up the wells and the great fissures in the rock in which the oil collects, is now reviving. Wells that were supposed to be utterly ruined are yielding again, since the water has been pumped out. New wells are going down in all directions, and within a few days a large number have "struck oil." On a single creek we hear of three, of a yield of 150, 400 and 960 barrels per day! One well has changed from pure water to over 200 barrels of oil per day! Illuminating oil is now worth from $6 to $7 per barrel, and lubricating oil as high as $30. A 5-barrel well, yielding illuminating oil, may be pumped at a good profit; one of the same capacity, yielding lubricating oil, is a splendid property. Wells yielding from 20 to 50 barrels per day are very common; many run from 50 to 100; a less number from that to 400 or 500; and one—the United States—yields over 900. The larger wells, those yielding over 10 barrels, are estimated to be worth $4,000 for each barrel of the daily flow, thus: a 10-barrel well is worth (land and working interest together) $40,000; a 100-barrel well, $400,000; a 500-barrel well, $2,000,000, etc. With these possible large prices, and with the fact established that the good wells are to-day worth many times the cost of all the worthless ones, it is absurd to talk of the petroleum business as "played out." The yield of petroleum, up to date, has been more than a hundred times in value all that has been legitimately spent in producing it.

Men will naturally and justly look well before they embark in any petroleum company, and the Tribune very justly advises not to put too many eggs in one basket—that is to say, not to invest too much in any one concern. Any well-managed company which strikes oil is bound to get back a royal return on its investment, and it is best to distribute one's capital among two or three sound working companies.

One of this kind, of which we have several times had occasion to speak, is the GLOBE PETROLEUM COMPANY, 458 Broadway, in this city, Frank Leslie, Esq., President. It has 200 acres of good petroleum lands in fee simple, and 405 in 20-year leases, carrying an average of five-sixths of the oil. The property is all paid for, and no money is required for any purpose except for putting down wells and developing the property. For this purpose 35,000 shares are offered to the public, out of the total 100,000, at $2 per share. This, if taken up, will enable the company to put down about 20 wells.

For full information, apply to John Clapp, Esq., Secretary, 458 Broadway, over Singer's Sewing Machine Company.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MR. CHASE has always had the recommendation of a handsome face and a noble person. Perhaps a finer-looking man could not be found in the States. He is in height about six feet four inches, is admirably built and erect. His face is pale, his complexion blonde, his forehead full, and his head in every way well formed. His eye is blue, clear and remarkably serene—his features regular and at the same time strong, and the expression of his face is that of seriousness and benevolence. His manner is kind without being at all warm, he is always courteous, and there is about him an air of refinement and culture. As a speaker he is plain, straightforward, and at times blunt. He has a slight lisp when he begins to speak, which is afterwards not heard, and his voice is vigorous, argumentative in its tone, and always quiet. Without being fluent he chooses his words well, and without pathos he impresses his audience deeply by the force of his own conviction. He has considerable humor, and now and then coins his thoughts into odd and telling phrases.

Mr. Chase has always been regarded as one of the most ambitious of American statesmen, and perhaps justly. His ambition is of that kind which Mr. Fox (afterwards Lord Holland) had when he said "he must have the Treasury; he had served up to it, and would have it." Mr. Chase firmly adhered to the cause of justice in America when it could give nothing and demanded all; step by step he has battled for its advancement, and it is scarcely wonderful that he should feel that his claim to the highest office, which, in its day of triumph, the cause for which he toiled 30 weary years can give, is valid. But it should not be forgotten that his ambition has never led to his shrinking from the task which is never popular—that of leading, and to that end combating the public mind. He has never been a popular man, and has been put in office because his ability was needed. At this moment, when every eminent self-seeker in America is waiting and hanging back to see if the popular breath will be for negro suffrage, the man who unhesitatingly commits the highest judicial opinion of the nation to the just side, and risks his personal prospects for it, is Salmon Portland Chase.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The editor of the Chattanooga Gazette visited the ruins where the fire occurred in that place a few days ago, and saw boys trying to knock the plugs out of the shells lying near the late fire, and one poured the powder out upon the hot bricks. He did not stop to remonstrate with them.

—— That was a queer freak the lightning took at a store in Rockville, Connecticut, one Saturday afternoon, a week or two ago. It entered at the door in a livid flash, which actually lighted an oil lamp, and left it burning, without leaving any other visible marks of its passage.

—— Col. James M. Sanderson, of New York, has been restored to his rank by the War Department. He was charged with disclosing to the rebel authorities at Richmond a plan of escape, devised by the other Federal prisoners there. The special order revoking his dismissal from the service says, that his conduct at Richmond deserves praise rather than censure.

—— A member of the Alabama delegation, now in Washington, brings the intelligence from that state that most of the Union citizens are unarmed, while the rebel element is well supplied with the arms formerly used by them in the army. He was present at the surrender of the rebel Rhoddy's command, and states that out of 2,000 men, but 80 delivered up their arms, accounting for the balance as lost, whereas they had been hidden, only to be afterwards reclaimed by the rebels.

—— It is said that L. P. Walker, the rebel secretary of war, who informed the world, that if the United States resisted the capture of Sumter, the rebel flag would soon float over Faneuil Hall, is soon to be an applicant for executive pardon.

—— It has been calculated that during the traveling season which has just set in, and which lasts from May to November, only six months, the expenditure of American tourists in Europe will not be less than $3,000,000.

—— The number of births in the state of Connecticut in 1864 was 9,734—151 less than in 1863, and 2,200 less than in 1861. There is an excess of 8,158 females in the total population of the state. There was a very large increase in the number of marriages, the returns showing 4,107, which is greater than any year preceding, except 1855. It is a gain of 1,969 over 1863. There were 9,109 deaths, or 669 more than in 1863. The proportion of males annually dying seems to be increasing.

—— A large and elegant hotel is to be erected in the Central Park, New York, in place of the little stone restaurant known as the Casino, which is inadequate to accommodate the countless thousands that throng the park every day. The new hotel will be without sleeping-rooms, and used exclusively as a house of refreshment. It will be kept under the stringent rules of the park.

—— A project is on foot at Leavenworth, Kansas, under the auspices of the American Union Cattle Association, for the capture, on the plains, of from 5,000 to 10,000 buffaloes, with the view of ultimately driving them to the States.

—— Forty-four gunboats, seven tugs and a number of other vessels, lately composing a portion of the Mississippi squadron, will be sold at Mound City, on August 17, to the highest bidder.

—— A furious tornado, moving from north-west to the south-east, swept over portions of Minnesota and Iowa on the 18th ult., covering, in some parts of its route, a breadth of fifty miles. Houses were blown down, trees wrenched off and uprooted, a number of persons killed, carriages and horses passing along the road seized and whisked off like bundles of straw, and havoc played in a multiplicity of forms.

—— Major General George H. Thomas, on the 20th of June, issued at Nashville, his headquarters, his official order on assuming charge of his new command, the Military Division of the Tennessee, embracing the states of Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama and Florida. His subordinate departmental commanders will be Generals J. M. Palmer, in Kentucky; Stoneman, in Tennessee; J. B. Steedman, in Georgia; C. R. Wood, in Alabama; and A. A. Humphreys, in Florida.

—— The country is now divided into five grand military divisions. The following are their names and commanders: Division of the Atlantic, Major General Meade; Division of the Mississippi, Major General Sherman; Division of the Tennessee, Major General Thomas; Division of the South-west, Major General Sheridan; Division of the Pacific, Major General Halleck.

—— The President, in his instructions to Indian Commissioner Dole, who is about to proceed to the Far West, for the purpose of effecting important treaties with the red men, directs him to press upon these wild and roving people the importance and necessity of abandoning their present savage and unsettled mode of life, and applying themselves to industry and the habits of civilization.

—— A proclamation has been issued by Governor Smythe, of New Hampshire, recommending the people of that state to embrace the approaching Fourth of July as a most appropriate day and occasion to extend to the returned soldiers a cordial and enthusiastic welcome, and to commemorate their patriotic deeds. Other Governors, including Governor Fenton, of this State, have made similar suggestions to the people of their respective commonwealths.

—— The following resolution was adopted by the great meeting at the Cooper Institute:

Resolved, That we hold this truth to be self-evident, that he with whom we can intrust the bullet to save the life of the nation, we can likewise intrust the ballot to preserve it; and we invoke the co-operation of the Federal and State Governments, and the people throughout the Union, to use all lawful means to establish a system of suffrage which shall be equal and just to all, black as well as white.

—— The Grand Jury of the United States District Court at Norfolk have found indictments for treason against some 40 well known rebels—among them Gen. Lee, Henry A. Wise, Gov. Letcher, Extra Billy Smith, Wm. N. McVeigh, formerly of Alexandria, David Funston, formerly of Alexandria, Wm. B. Richards, Jr., James Lyon, of Richmond, and Generals Breckinridge, Early and Kemper.

—— It is reported that Gen. Lee and A. H. Stevens have made special applications to President Johnson for pardon.

—— Neither Grant nor Sherman were among the "good boys" of the Military Academy at West Point, Sherman standing No. 124 in the order of good behavior and Gen. Grant falling as low as 147. In scholarship, too, neither of them obtained a place among the honored five. Sherman, who stood the first year at No. 9, did, indeed, graduate at No. 6, but Grant, beginning with 23 above him, rose only at graduation to No. 21.

—— Miss Maria Mitchell, of Nantucket, whose labors in astronomy have made her name well known, is to have charge of the astronomical department in Vassar Female College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

—— A. O. P. Nicholson, who was United States Senator from Tennessee, when the war broke out, petitions the President, who was then his colleague, most earnestly for pardon.

—— A woman called on an attorney in Williamsport, N. Y., one day last week, and requested his assistance in collecting bounty and pay for two husbands who had been killed during the rebellion. Her third husband accompanied her.

—— It appears from the testimony before the Military Commission, that the tremendous explosion of vessels discharging stores at City Point on the 9th of August, was caused by an infernal machine introduced by John Maxwell, of the rebel secret service, who left Richmond on the 20th of July in company with R. R. Dillard.

—— The number of letters which are now received at the Dead Letter Office in Washington, sent there under the new law which makes prepayment of postage compulsory, amounts to more than 15,000 a week.

—— The treaty between the United States and the Republic of Honduras is officially proclaimed. It provides for perpetual amity and reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation. Honduras engages to open negotions with the various governments with which it may have relations, for their separate recognition of the perpetual neutrality, and for the protection of the contemplated Honduras Inter-Oceanic Railway, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans. Honduras agrees that the right of way or transit over such route, shall be at all times open and free to the government and citizens of the United States for all lawful purposes whatever; and, in consideration of these concessions, the United States engages, in conjunction with Honduras, to protect the same from interruption, seizure or unjust confiscation, in whatever quarter the attempt may proceed so long as the spirit and intention of this article, on this subject, shall be preserved.

—— It is well remembered that when the war for the suppression of the rebellion broke out the Northern sympathisers in our midst gathered the old copper cents and had them transferred into breast-pins, to indicate that they were "copperheads." "Now," says an exchange, "that the chief of rebels has adopted the 'petticoat,' would it not be well for them to get a new badge? No suggestion is needed as to what it should be."

—— In digging a well in Cedar Falls, Iowa, a black walnut log was found 20 feet below the surface of the ground.

—— Brigham Young has ordered a bell from a foundry in Troy, probably to call his flock of wives together.

—— The "Hermitage," the last dwelling-place of General Jackson, is in a very dilapidated condition. It was purchased by the state of Tennessee, in 1856, for $48,000. Mrs. A. Jackson, widow of the late proprietor, has appealed to President Johnson for a permanent home at the Hermitage. The President referred her application to Governor Brownlow.

—— The editor of the Universalist having been censured by a correspondent for intimating that Jeff. Davis should be hung, replies: "After the excitement has passed, and Jefferson Davis is hung, we may be sorry! But, in all soberness, let us say, if Jefferson Davis is not hung, the hand that in this land ever after signs a death-warrant should drop from its socket. If he is pardoned, let every prison door open."

—— Two young men on board the steamer St. John, from New York for Albany, set a good example by their presence of mind and cool determination the other night. A kerosene lamp broke in a closet, and the burning fluid covered the floor. Intense alarm, of course, ensued; but the young fellows stood at the door, and refused to allow even the officers of the boat to enter until the kerosene was burned out. The theory was, that if the door was opened and water poured in the flames would not be extinguished, but would be floated to other combustible material, at the risk of destruction to all.

Obituary.—One of the most prominent as well as one of the most able and respected among our authoresses, Lydia H. Sigourney, has recently passed from the life in which her talent and power and delicate fancy had made her so great a reputation. It is many years since we last saw Mrs. Sigourney, and had the pleasure of listening to her graceful and pleasant voice, yet it scarcely seems more than yesterday, so accustomed had we been to regard her as a positive celebrity, without calculating her age or reckoning her probable duration, still among us. Yet she is now dead—dead in the fullness of her years, 76—having barely overrun the allotted time, and preserved her literary reputation untarnished by one of those pure and virtuous lives which typify the literary character in its most blameless and perfect form.

Foreign.—A play entitled "Four years of civil war in America; or the Death of Lincoln," has been presented at a theatre in Vienna."

—— The demonstrations of all kinds in favor of Mr. Lincoln continue in England. A biography of 160 pages, illustrated, has reached a sale of more than 100,000 copies, and photographs are sold by the thousand. The portraits and biography of President Johnston are also such much sought after.

—— The painter Rothmeun, of Duesseldorf, has made a will, in which he bequeathed $400 to four friends to "go on a spree" with, and $100 to his colleagues, to drink a "memorial punch" for him.

—— "How I managed my children from infancy to marriage," is the title of a "Mother's own book" just issued in London.

—— It is stated that the Empress of Russia "only" spent $300,000 during her seven months' stay at Nice.

—— The number of fires in London last year exceeded the number of fires in Paris, Berlin, Vienna, St. Petersburg and Philadelphia put together.

—— The Duchess of Argyle's little girls have sent a box of clothing to the colored children in America, worth about $100, which they made themselves.

—— The rents of the London theatres are enormous. That of the Haymarket is nearly £4,000 a year; of Drury Lane, £7,800; the Princess' is sub-let at £4,000; the Adelphi is £4,500; and the Lyceum £4,000.

—— Two English newspapers are now published at Yokohama, in Japan—one the daily Japan Herald, the motto of which is "Onward, prese onward;" and the other is the weekly Japan Herald.

—— We have at length the official report of the evacuation of the Island of San Domingo by the Spanish troops. The news that the Spanish Government had finally decided on the abandonment of the island, was received on May 28, and as everything was ready for embarkation, the evacuation began at once. It seems that the partisans of Spain were leaving simultaneously with the Spanish troops.

—— The latest dates from Chihuahua show that on the 8th of May the French troops were at least 300 miles from that city, which is strongly fortified, and, therefore, it is not probable they would move in that direction. There is reason for believing, from semi-official sources, that the recently published report that President Juarez was on his way to the United States is untrue. The prospects of the Liberals as represented as encouraging.

—— Several great historical personages have recently been introduced in the mimic life of the European stage. At Geneva a play has been produced, in which Calvin figures. At Vienna another drama has been acted, in which Pitt, Fox, and George III. are characters. At Turin a new play introduces Struensee, the unhappy lover of the beautiful young Queen of Denmark, the sister of George III.

—— No less than 5,000 photographs of Booth, the assassin, have been sold by one firm in London.

—— A suicide was recently committed by a young woman employed as saleswoman in a shop in the Rue de Rivoli, Paris. Before lighting a pan of charcoal, with which she put an end to her existence, she had decorated her room with flowers, and then dressed herself in white. When found, she was lying on her bed, her hands folded on her breast, and her countenance bearing a looking so placid that she might have been supposed to be sleeping. She had written a letter to her mother, asking for forgiveness, and stating the motive which had prompted her suicide.

—— A few days ago an Englishman went to Paris to take out a patent in France for an invention to detect pickpockets. He entered an omnibus and sat by the side of an elegantly dressed lady, with a very charming face. Soon the Englishman saw an expression of distress and dismay come over that face, and felt a tugging at his pocket. With a cruel smile he looked at the fair creature, who, crimson with shame, implored him to let her go. With true gallantry he released her hand, and she thereupon stopped the omnibus, leaped out, and ran down the street with most unfeminine speed. The Englishman was highly pleased with the success of his device, which consists of a strong calico diaphragm stretched across the pocket with an India rubber opening that expands to permit the entrance of a strange hand, but will not do so to permit it to withdraw.

AT SPRINGFIELD, MAY 4TH, 1865.

BY THEODORE P. COOKE.

You have brought him back to his friends and former neighbors,
To those who knew him in an earlier day;
You have brought him back, for he hath wrought
his labors,
And trod his way.

We will lay him down in grief and lamentations,
Beneath the trees where the white blossoms blow;
We will lay him down, and on his grave, a nation's Hot tears shall flow.

'Twas winter when he left, we all remember
His parting words, his smile, the kindly face,
Whose loss hath made May bleaker than December
In every place.

There was so much of quiet calm sedateness
About this man, that few had ever guessed,
The power of thought, and all the wealth of greatness
That he possessed.

But we who grasped his rugged hand full often,
Did love him much—how much we now may tell,
As bending reverently above his coffin,
We say farewell.

Farewell! his work is done; the tragic story
Too well we know; so let us lay him down,
And wrap him in the purple shroud of glory—
His is the crown.

WHITE WHALES.—The ever curious public will be gratified to learn that Mr. Barnum has, at an expense that would buy any similar establishment in the United States, added to his million curiosities two White Whales. Consequently the increased rush to the Museum.

LUTHER'S WIFE.—Luther married Catherine de Bora, an escaped nun—a remarkably handsome woman. In his letters to his friends, he spoke of her as "My rib Kitty, my loved Kitty, my empress Kitty." A year after his marriage, when struggling with poverty, he said, in one of these letters, "Catherine, my dear rib, salutes you. She is quite well, thank heaven; gentle, obedient, and kind in all things—quite beyond my hopes. I would not exchange my poverty with her, for all the riches of Crœsus without her." A dozen years after, he said: "Catherine, thou hast a pious man who loves thee: thou art a very empress!" Yet Luther had his little troubles in connection with his married life. Catherine was fond of small talk, and when Luther was busily engaged in solving the difficulties of the Bible, she would interrupt him with such questions as—Whether the King of France was richer than his cousin the Emperor of Germany? If the Italian women were more beautiful than the German? If Rome was as big as Wittenberg? and so on. To escape these little inquiries, Luther saw no other way than to lock himself up in his study, with a quantity of bread and cheese and there hold his work. But Catherine still pursued him. One day, when he was thus locked up, laboring at his translation of the twenty-second psalm, the door was assailed by his wife. No answer was given. More knocking followed, accompanied by Catherine's voice, shouting: "If you don't open the door, I will go and fetch the locksmith." The doctor entreated his wife not to interrupt his labors. "Open, open!" repeated Catherine. The doctor obeyed. "I was afraid," said she, on entering, "that something bad vexed you, locked up in this room alone." To which Luther replied, "The only thing that vexes me now is yourself." But Luther, doubtless, entertained a steady, though sober affection for his wife: and in his will, in which he left her sole executrix, bequeathing to her all his property, he speaks of her as "always a gentle, pious, and faithful wife to me, and that has loved me tenderly." "Whatever," he adds, "may happen to her after my death, I have, I say, full confidence that she will ever conduct herself as a good mother towards her children."

CURIOUS ACTION OF A GLASS ROD.—Place a tube, say two feet long, before a fire, in a horizontal position, having the position properly supported, say by putting in a cork at each end supported by pins for an axis; the rod will acquire a rotary motion round the axis, and also a progressive motion towards the fire, even if the supporters are declined from the fire. When the progressive motion of the tube towards the fire is stopped by any obstacle, the rotation is still continued. When the tubes are placed in nearly an upright position, leaning to the right hand, the motion will be from east to west; but if they lean to the left hand, their motion will be from west to east; and the nearer they are placed to an upright position the less will be their motion either way. If the tubes be placed on a sheet of glass, instead of moving towards the fire they will move from it, and about the axis in a contrary direction from what they did before; nay, they will recede from the fire, and move a little upwards when the plane inclines towards the fire."

A KNIGHT OF THE NEW CRUSADE.

Among my comrades here I stand
An orphan and alone,
No father's care, no mother's love
Can claim me for its own.

My lips are pure from kiss of wine,
Or maiden's lips as red,
No home is sad for loss of me,
No heart will mourn me dead.

My comrades talk of distant friends,
Of wives and children dear;
They hear will them into the fray
A thought of love and fear.
I love my men; I love my sword,
No other love have I,
But in my country's cause I fight,
And for her sake would die.

And if I watch with longing eyes
What time the mail comes in,
To see the poorest soldier hid
The loved "home-letter" win,
I know that it is better so;
If death should be my fate,
No woman's heart will break for me,
No home be desolate.

For I have vowed me with a vow
(As did the knight of old),
That while the land is rent with war,
And I my sword can hold,
No home shall lure me from the camp,
No dearer duties rise,
No woman tempt me to forsake
For her the high emprise.

But sometimes when, as now, I lie
A dreaming in my tent,
Fair maiden faces, tender-eyed,
Above my couch have bent,
And murmured in low voices sweet
Of happy days in store—
Of peace, and rest, and joy, and love,
Mine when the war is o'er.

It may be so. God grant it may!
It is a pleasant dream;
It shines upon my darker hours
As with a heavenly gleam.
"Up! up! to arms! the enemy!"
Swift fly the visions blest.
Oh God! protect me through the fight,
Or take me to thy rest!

A Monomaniac's Story.

I CANNOT tell how or precisely at what time the feeling first overtook me; I can only ascribe its origin to the fact that we were so perfectly happy. I knew that our lives had reached the culminating point—so happy, that only death could preserve to us the bliss in which we had reveled during the past months.

"IT HAS COME; IT HAS COME!"

I wish to tell my story plainly and clearly; there is no confusion in my mind. I can remember distinctly every minute detail of that season, and I shall set them all down here, to be read by those who may chance to discover this record.

We had been married three months. Our wedtook place in June, and we came immediately to this quiet cottage, where there was no one to intrude upon our solitude—where all through the summer days no sound met our ears but the tones of each other's voice, and the soft whispers of the sycamores that grew close to the porch, and the long, musical lap of the sea against the beach beyond.

ON THE WATER.

We had attained to our happiness through trouble and grief; we had been separated for a season by false friends. I had been a wanderer in distant climes, and Marian a silent watcher in her darkened home. Without any premonition which would have given us strength to prepare for our great bliss—for sudden joy unnerves the soul as suffering can never do—the clouds broke away, the terrible night flushed into a morning bright as that which first glorified Eden, and we found ourselves united, faint, delirious under the magic spell which had so unexpectedly swept aside the darkness, and left us standing in our new world together.

We were married and came hither. There might be words found strong enough to paint the lowest depth of human woe, but no human language can depict the ecstasy of happiness which was ours during those first weeks.

Never such heavenly days unfolded on earth as those were; never such a moon will shine again as hung its tremulous globe over the gold-tinted sea. How many were there? I cannot tell; weeks, whole weeks, perhaps. Then, in the midst of my joy, there came over my soul, at intervals, a vague shudder, a faint dread, inexplicable—how shall I describe it?

Can you fancy a man walking through some magic cavern in a dream, entranced by the beauty of the scene, lulled to forgetfulness of the whole world, yet at times startled by a warning from beyond those flower-wreathed portals stood some horrible shape, ready to seize him in its bony grasp as he passed the last of the fragrant mazes? I can picture that feeling, which began to haunt me in no other way; it is clear to you and me. You who read these pages will read it then with your souls, and be able to comprehend the suffering pen has never critically.

I remember the night when the fear and the horror just became palpable—when it started up before me like a living shape, and froze my very soul with its glance. We were sitting in the little room that looked out upon the sea; the moon was past the full, and hung, golden and misty, above the fleecy white clouds that bordered the horizon. There was no wind. The color of the pavement at side in all the casement, the low murmur of the waves was like the hymns of angels. No other sound save my whispered voices, which died away at last in one kiss of ecstacy when words were too feeble.

Marian was lying with her head upon my knees; I was playing with her long fair hair, dizzy, faint with my happiness. That strange dread had not awakened my self for days. On a sudden it came back. I felt myself shiver, not outwardly, down, in the core of my being. Stronger grew the fear, colder the chill. I waited, like a man who waits the coming of a ghost; yet all the while the hand that clasped Marian's did not tremble, and I could she lay, with her glorious face upturned in the moonlight, a half-smile on its lips, and her eyes filled with a light which no mortal passion ever possessed before.

Then I heard the voice—once, or twice, when that horror came to me, I had heard a faint whisper, but now the tones were perfectly distinct:

"Kill her! Your happiness is consuming her! Kill her, before the heaven of these weeks fades like the bliss of common men."

I think I must have touched my hand. Certainly it was an involuntary movement which my fingers twist themselves in the long curls, and wind them about her throat in a slight wreath.

She raised her eyes to mine with a heavenly smile, saying:

"Do you wish to strangle me, Gerald?"

My hand dropped; her voice broke the spell.

"Perhaps it would be better," I answered; "we can never be so happy again as now."

"Darling," she whispered, "we are together; only a moment's pain enough to separate us could deprive us of our happiness."

But it has reached its fulness, Marian; if it should pale and wane like the moon we have watched over the sea yonder?"

She trembled and grew pale.

"If I should die, Gerald—if I believed it possible—I would beg you to kill me; death at your hands would be sweet, compared to life with any change."

"Could you bear to die, Marian?"

"With you, yes; how could I fear? Do I not know that our souls are so joined even eternity will not separate us?"

Then I heard the voice again, but an instant after Marian's light laugh drowned its whisper.

"Really we are growing too fanciful," she said. "We have nothing in our dreams, half so fair and more like people of this world than if we were an enchanted pair in fairyland."

"But it is so terrible to think of any change."

She raised herself, and twined one arm about my neck, pushing my head back with her other hand to look full in my eyes.

"Dear Gerald," she said, in her low, earnest voice, that always, in the most momentous, had a little tremor in it, which made her words sound like music; "I thought you had cured yourself of, or I thought happiness had made you forget, the old morbid melancholy. Don't ever think of such a possibility. God has been very good to us; do not let us be thankful and wicked enough to doubt Him now."

She brought quiet and peace with her words—I forgot everything but the present. We went out and walked up and down the garden porch in the moonlight, and under the spell of her presence my soul was as calm as though no shadow had ever troubled it.

But late that night, when the moon was hidden under a sweep of cloud, that hung down like the folds of a shroud, and Marian slept in the stillest gloom, with her face shut out from my love, I arose and to rise and pace the chamber with stealthy steps, troubled again by the unseen spirit that had before haunted me.

I passed by the window and looked out across the sea, but my limbs and soul refused. Several times I stooped over the bed where Marian lay, and gazed at her helpless beauty; but always that one thought was with me, and I could not drive it from my mind. At last I put the thing resolutely aside. I promised to think of it later—whether a promise given to myself or some power that was urging me on, I could not tell. When the dawn began to break gray and cold, I lay down and slept—kept soundly for hours till the chamber was all aglow with the sun, and Marian's voice roused me from that dreamless slumber.

"You lazy, lazy boy!" she cried. "Get up; get up! It is the most heavenly morning, and I want to go out on the water."

We had a happy day. From this time forth I could begin to number many such.

We rowed for miles along the beach to a little cove that was one of our favorite resting-places. On one side the rocks rose up, gray and bare, crowned upon their summits with a knot of pines that had been watchers there for ages; below, the sand lay white and pure, dotted with sea shells and strange weeds; at that back there was a long view inland, with green pastures and woodlands shutting in the distance, and in front the restless sea, without a single sail in sight to break the majestic solitude.

Sometimes a troop of hood-winged birds would dart past, or a flock of gulls would swim close to shore and rest on the long swell, regarding us quietly, while Marian attempted to hold a conversation with them in a language she had invented for their benefit; but there were no other intruders upon our retirement.

We had our books and papers; I sketched and Marian read to me, or we talked together about the sand, or climbed the cliffs; we put aside both past and future; life had nothing for us save the fullness of present joy.

But the dread, the horror—it hung about me; day after day it loomed up blacker and more tangible; night after night it held me firm in its grasp, and even the sight of Marian's face, the sound of Marian's voice, which at first could always drive it away, would sometimes nerve the tempest in my soul.

I will not dwell on it all, I could reason perfectly; there was no trouble; my mind seemed clearer and more acute than it had ever been. I was able to grasp the rarest and firmest theories; I wrote several of the clearest papers I ever produced. I remember being able to demonstrate to some professors a discovering which a friend wrote me; my memory grew so perfect that I could repeat whole pages of old Greek poets after I had read them but a few hours; minute events connected with my childhood came back, and I could remember all the children among the strange efforts which cost me no trouble whatever.

In mention these things to show you how clear my mind was, and how completely my reasoning faculties were under my control.

But the fear grew more and more strangely acute. I could hear a footstep long before it was distinguishable to another, and this increased until I actually dreaded to hear a voice from no visible disease, only from the sudden development of the mental qualities which seemed to be the most dreadful to me. I had the need which had taken possession of me—to carry my happiness out of this world, before it should change, before the fear that grew always stronger. I argued the matter; I tried to decide whether it was the thought of change or death that I most dreaded; but Marian influenced me as at work to direct me. In that case was the power a good or evil one?

Sometimes when I had been happy for hours I was thrown into paroxysms of distress by the idea that it might be possible some creature who could influence me, by simply changing me, so that some of those impalpable beings which exist, without doubt, in the universe, hostile to human joy, might be able to put its power into my mind.

I thought a great deal about that; I read some strange old German books upon such subjects, but I could arrive at no conclusion.

I have spoken often of the time when Marian began to tremble under the shadow; this was the hastening of the consummation.

I was perfectly conscious that I could not close my eyes until daylight, and Marian grew restless and watched. She said, too, that my appetite failed, and that I grew worn and pale, and always vexed me with her importunities; it seemed so unkind when I suffered more in her behalf than for my own, for I knew it all deeply enough.

We were out in the boat; it was a rather gloomy day, and I was complaining of the heat. Suddenly the wind came up and rocked the frail bark to and fro, but Marian never had any fear.

"You are frightened, Gerald," she said.

"Never with you, darling," she answered, and either to re-assure me or carrying out some superstition of her own, she began to sing, and sing in a low voice fragments of a song that I had written long before.

I dropped the oars, and started up with a bound that sent the boat over on its side. I caught Marian in my arms, crying out:

"It is come! it is come! Let us go together; come, Marian, come; there is no parting now!"

She was struggling in my arms and looking up in my face, with an expression in her eyes I had never seen before there—fear and horror, and of me—oh, my God, of me!

"Gerald," she moaned, "Gerald! Are you mad? You shall drown! Not suicide, Gerald—not suicide!"

Then she clung a dead weight in my arms—she had fainted. I never could recall the reaction in my mind, it troubled me for days afterwards; but when I saw her white face drop lifeless on my shoulder, and for an instant believed her dead, it seemed to me that I must go mad.

I tried to revive her; I dashed the salt foam in her face; I kissed her cheek and lips; I was wild in frenzy; but there was no response.

The tide had drifted us near the shore. I sprang into the water, carrying her in my arms, and ran towards the house.

We laid her upon the bed; I drove away the officious servants and attended her myself, but before she recovered, the physician, for whom they had sent unauthorized, made his appearance.

When Marian lay back on the pillows weak and faint, but able to smile in answer to my entreaties, she to raise her dear eyes to mine, the doctor drew me out of the chamber, and after many leading questions, warned me that it was like an attack of heart disease; great care must be exercised; she must have quiet—kept far from agitation, or the malady might declare itself suddenly and fatal.

From that time, peace and serenity were gone from Marian's soul; not that she changed; not that her love altered; she was gentle and tender as ever; nay, if that had been possible, I believe she loved me better than before; but she could not forget the events of that day; she could not recover from the wild fear which had wakened in her mind.

I was lying on the sofa one afternoon, in the the little room where we liked so much to linger, and Marian sat on a low stool at my feet. She had been reading to me. I recollect the book—Bailey's Festus, always so great a favorite with me—and I had been musing over and vaguely applying after a new life. I could even recal the very passage I read, so distinctly are all things connected with those days impressed upon my mind. I had closed my eyes—perhaps she thought I was sleeping, for her voice grew heavy and lower and at last died away entirely. I glanced furtively at her; she was regarding me with a tenderness of which pained me beyond expression. I could not forbear stretching out my hand and grasping hers; the one hold I had left me.

"Gerald," she said, in a hesitating way.

"What is it?" I asked.

"I want to say something to you, dear," striking my head gently with her velvety fingers. "You know, love, that I would tear you for the world; but I am afraid you are not well. You don't sleep; you grow thin and pale—"

"Marian!" I cried, impatiently, calmly enough; "you are fanciful, darling, I am never ill, you know."

"But if you would only consult a physician—just to gratify me, dear."

"Marian!" I said, in the whole exclamation race, Marian," I answered; "don't ask me such a thing."

"Because, please do," she urged; "for my sake, Gerald; it is so little a thing to do."

"What should I tell him? I am perfectly well."

"But you have sleepless nights, you want of appetite, your—your—"

"Well?" I asked, coldly, for it is that."

"Not that I am aware of; I don't even know whom you mean."

"Oh, Gerald, you start at the least sound; you have such a strange way of looking as if you saw something which no one else in the room but ourselves; only don't be vexed."

"Indeed I am not; but tell me what it is you fear?"

"That you are going to have some severe illness—some fever."

"You think I am going mad," I interrupted, coldly. "Really, Marian, a wife ought to be the last person to entertain such a fancy."

She gave a sort of gasping cry; oh, I knew by her face that I struck home, but she said quickly—

"No, no! I am not such a horrible world—dear, dear Gerald, don't cver again."

"They came me no terror," I answered. "Don't be alarmed, my darling; Marian, my mind was never so clear as now. I don't think I reason, talk or write much like a madman."

"No, no, I am foolish and silly; oh, I couldn't bear such a horrible thought, even in jest."

"Then, child," I said kindly enough, though I felt irritated and sore—in that mood when one must hurt the being one loves best.

"I have spoken of what would have me be, Gerald," she answered, kissing my hand.

"Now that I think of it," I continued, "it did seem to me that you had got into a morbid, melancholy way, that people called madness, but I never believed it was such."

"For the love of heaven, stop!" she exclaimed, pale as a ghost, and shaking from head to foot. "Gerald, you will kill me!"

"Because you think I am going mad," I said, raising myself on one arm, and looking full in her face.

She uttered passionate denials, threw herself on my bosom, and burst into an agony of tears.

"Would to heaven I were of me if it were so?" I went on. "Would you do as so many women have done—try to place me in confinement?"

"Gerald, Gerald!" she moaned, "not ever death can part you and me—never question me again."

"That's all I desired—death!" I said.

"But we are so happy, Gerald—so happy! Why should we wish to die?"

"To preserve our happiness, to carry it beyond the reach of earthly peril."

"Life and death are in God's hands," she replied. "I will trust in him as you say—please don't."

She forced herself to be calm; by and-bye she was capable of strong self-control, and the suffering of the past had increased it to a degree of which I never could have dreamed women capable.

"Then you shall read to me again," I said; "no, you shall sing, that is better."

She looked at me with a wistful, inquiring look, as though she would read my soul, but I only repeated my words calmly.

I stepped noiselessly out of bed; for a moment I thought the time had come; then I knew I must wait—one more trial for the morrow.

The morning came and passed; the afternoon wore on beyond sunset. We had been out to walk; we came in and sat down in the darkened room, and the voice of the sea came up with a sorrowful murmur I had never heard in its tone.

Marian moved to the mantel to light the lamp; I followed her noiselessly, and caught her in both arms, she uttered a cry, more like beyond her terror.

"You are afraid," I exclaimed, for a sort of frenzy overtook me so find that my suspicions were true. "You are afraid—you feel the other day—you do think me mad!"

She was gasping for breath; I could hear her striving to pray in broken words.

"Where is your love?" I demanded. "You lied—you do fear me."

"Gerald, Gerald!" she moaned. "Help us both; oh, my God—let me go—I am afraid!"

When she made this avowal I grew calm; I laid her on the sofa and she fell back, not fainting, but perfectly helpless.

I lighted the lamp, made the room cheerful and bright, and then returned to her side. I took her in my arms; I cuild her by every endearing name; I told her how great my love was—I believe I even had those words to him my soul so completely as then—and after a time she grew quiet.

But the fear was not gone; no, no, I saw that only her love was so great, her soul so strong, that it mastered its power. She acknowledged that she had suffered, that she believed me ill, and again begged me to consult a physician.

It had come, the moment had arrived, we must leave this world, or I must lose her forever. From the instant I made this resolution I was content. I was never more wholly happy than during that evening. Everything was arranged; we should leave this earth; in the existence beyond nothing could ever sever our love. I only wished that I had taken her and gone before, in the first week of our beautiful dream, when no shadow had dared to fall upon it. But even in the cold time the chain that bound us was not yet broken—mine, not for this poor world only, but above, forever, in a blaze that never should grow dim.

It was in the middle of the night. I was so calm, a serene joy sat in my soul, such as one might feel when they put forth into a new land where purer happiness awaits him—nothing more.

I lighted a lamp, kept this earthly shape without pain, especially, instantly, so that she should go straight from her dream into the new life, and bending over her I gently compressed the change, find my soul standing by her side.

I had in my room a case of strange instruments which my father—whom men called a mad—like idiots—had brought from some far-off clime; even the uses or names were not known to me, so far from my boyhood had they been fashioned.

Among these were two long slender needles, no thicker than a hair, but with a hard and keen that would pierce through all but the hardest substance.

I selected one of these together—but there was no way—if I could spare her the momentary pang men call death, the wrenching of the soul from the bonds that so closely united it to mine.

I was standing by the bed. I bent over to press a kiss upon her mouth, the last time my lips would touch hers on earth—and I recoil! How strange it was to think that in a few instants our disembodied spirits would stand beyond the stars, looking down upon the world and surveying the two cold figures that a little time before held us in thrall.

I had raised her in her sleep, as smile softened her mouth, she murmured my name.

"Gerald, Gerald!"

Her hand rested on mine, the one that held the blessed means of freedom, and for a while I was forced to remain motionless lest I should rouse her from her happy dream.

Again she whispered:

"Gerald, Gerald!"

Her fingers loosened their hold; the smile still lingered on her lips.

My hand was steadied, I had no fear; it was no parting. Like a flash of lightning the tiny thread penetrated the skull. There was a faint shiver of the whole frame, nothing more. I raised the twin weapon, I raised it—

"Wait for me, Marian!" I cried; "I am coming—I follow!"

My hand was seized and held in a grasp that seemed to crush the very bone. I could feel my sister and her husband, I could hear their voices in the invisible thing. I could breathe still. I could see. I could live. I heard it has—

"Lost! lost!"

Then I comprehended. I had been lured on by this power that I dreaded. Marian was lost to me! I did not go mad—even then I would not. I summoned all my energies, I battled fiercely, but all in vain.

I must have fallen insensible. When I woke, the chamber was light as day. I was lying half across the body, half on the bed, and close to my cheek was the cold face of Marian.

I understood the uselessness of further effort. I had forgotten nothing. I felt no grief; only stormed and lost—Marian was gone!

I called her—shook her arm; it was useless—gone beyond the far waters.

I went out and summoned the servants—no effort could restore her. The physician came; I was sitting by the bed when he entered, but I paid no heed to him, I kept him away.

"It was as I thought—she had heart disease."

I know they questioned me. I wanted to tell the truth. If I saved myself her murderer they would give me the death I desired.

I tried to shriek the words—not a syllable would come—my tongue was paralyzed. I could not move—could only lie there and watch the white face of my Marian.

Always trying to die—always guarded by those unseen agents and compelled to linger here. I cannot tell whether hours or days or weeks went by. After that long blank I find myself in this lonely room; a man watches me—it is idle—I never wish to go out—what is his poor watching compared to the guardians he cannot see? I ask him no questions—I do not wish to speak to any one. I am here in the room from whence Marian's soul went forth.

Oh, the poor wife, the darling! She is waiting for me—she pines for me and I cannot go!

If I could only speak—a single word—but no—if I would talk of ordinary things they would permit, but the secret they will not allow to pass my lips, so I am silent.

I see them now—that is only very lately—it gives me a little hope. I shall be able to know if they even by any chance leave me—it only needs an instant—I have the weapon always concealed in my breast. They do not know that I have gained the power of watching them in turn—I never raise my eyes toward them—the moment will come.

I have found this paper again—I believe for some time past I have written nothing. To think that men would call me mad—perhaps have—but these pages will set all right when they are found.

One of them is in the room—his back is toward me—sometimes I think if I could spring upon him—could overpower him—was that Marian's voice?

The record ended here.

After the sudden and mysterious death of Marian he had been placed under restraint in the little dwelling where their brief happiness went out in a tragedy so terrible.

Upon that last day Gerald seemed unusually engaged with the manuscript which he so carefully hid from his keepers, and they had left him alone for a time. One of them passing through the hall heard the struggle, the fierce cry as the poor wretch sprang upon his fancied or unseen enemies—who shall decide which they were? When he entered the apartment Gerald lay motionless upon the floor, a stream of blood issuing from his mouth and nostrils. He had burst some artery about the heart in that last frenzied effort, and death followed almost instantly.

[Although rather late in the day, the following ought to go on record only as a deserved tribute to one of our ablest and most efficient generals.]

SHERMAN.

THE mountain ridges caught the hail
Sent from the distant sea,
"Know ye a man who cannot fail,
Send him to me."

"I beat the hostile coast in vain,
My teeth gnash on the sand,
Send on whose genius mounts to pain
And high command.

The ridges answered, "We of late
Have felt a mighty tread,
And hosts have passed us strong as fate
To victory led."

"And he whose thought upheld their hands
Turned every rocky key,
And ope'd the gates to sunny lands
Nearer the sea."

"The man is strong in self-control,
And genius is his mail—
An earnest and resistless soul—
He cannot fail."

"Though perils gather far and near
Between our common blue,
We send, without a doubt or fear,
This man to you."

And Sherman went along the west—
The mountain chains are free;
While now he takes his mighty rest
Beside the sea.

GUY'S FOLLY;

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

CHAPTER XVI.—THE FIRST ABDUCTION.

IT was merry morning—a smiling morning, when the sunlight danced and shimmered on the flowers.

A morning it was when all nature seemed to have let itself loose for enjoyment—when the birds went mad with enjoyment, and the very flowers seemed to give out a fresher and purer perfume—a morning when one could scarcely feel dispirited at will; when the heart could be nothing but elastic; when every leaf, and branch, and stone in your path seemed to invite you out "into the merry sunshine"—into the green and bejeweled meadows.

This was the morning when Clara Arbuthnot had chosen to leave her home and fly with Denzil Harcourt.

She looked sweetly pretty as she tripped along, attired in her light dress, her jaunty hat, and her little mantle, not concealing her plump and rounded shoulders.

The gaiety of nature appeared to instil itself into her mind; for never thinking of those she left behind, or the danger she was seeking, she tripped merrily, even eagerly along; imagining to herself only the pleasure of her journey's end, and not once its perils or the suspicion it would arouse.

I may be accused of exaggerating here; but I am not.

Every girl who runs away with a man at his request alone, and not with her own consent, incurs danger—a danger so great as to warrant her refusal on any terms.

This reasoning may, and no doubt will, offend many young lovers; but it is, nevertheless, the proper reasoning.

Not that I advocate long courtships—hopeless ones, too often—where parents on both sides are inexorable; but at least the day after the ceremony it should be a rule to return home; and even if consent be not given then, an open residence in the vicinity of home would rob life of much of its sorrows and perils.

It will be remembered, that when on the eve of departure from the cottage, Denzil had whispered to her the necessity of altering the place of meeting.

It was, therefore, at the Hazel Dell, near Ennistone church, that Clara Arbuthnot expected to meet her lover.

It was a pretty spot, infinitely wild and romantic in its appearance.

Fancy a circular glade in the midst of a dense copse, crossed by a little narrow, rapid brook, which rushed, and bubbled, and rattled on its noisy course over the rough, stony ground.

The soft grass twinkled in the rays of the morning sun with thousands of diamond-like dewdrops; the broad green leaves of the bushes, which gave the place its name, rustled with a gentle sound in the soft, balmy breeze; here and there a tall ash tree raised its graceful head above the mass of underwood; the ground was dotted with wild flowers of every scent and hue.

Birds fluttered about the bushes, or warbled their love-song from the tree-top, while a splendid pheasant strutted about, displaying his radiant plumage, conscious of the security which the game laws afforded him.

When she arrived at the extremity of the dell, she had not long to wait.

Hardly had she been there a moment, before she observed her lover walking down the lane.

He advanced eagerly to meet her, and taking both of her hands, kissed her fondly.

"Dear Clara, you have not deceived me," he cried. "See—I believed in your truth, for yonder is the carriage, which will take us swiftly from the reach of danger."

She looked surprised.

"The carriage!" she said. "What is that for, dear Denzil?"

He laughed lightly.

"Why, Clara, my darling, you could not walk to London, you know."

"To London, Denzil! Why need we go to London? I thought we were to be married here!"

He seemed quite astonished.

"Married here! No, dear Clara, that would be madness. It would be courting discovery and danger. No—we shall arrive in London in three hours, and can be married at once."

Clara hesitated, and blushed.

But how could she recede now?

She had hoped, and indeed wished, that she would be married at Ennistone Church—would live in the neighborhood, and be reconciled soon to their friends; and now it was evident that, though her lover had listened and understood her words, he had not observed them, or, at any rate, paid no attention to them.

However, as I have said, she could not recede now; and, indeed, the idea of receding never entered her mind.

The hesitation was nothing—it was gone in a moment.

Come, then, Clara," he said; "we must not linger here. Your absence may be discovered, and then all chance of our union will be gone."

She took his proffered arm, and walked on with him hastily while he proceeded:

"If our marriage had taken place at Ennistone Church, it would certainly have been interrupted. Even now, as I glance up the hill, I fancy I see figures moving in the distance. See!" he cried, stopping for a moment.

Clara glanced eagerly in the direction in which he pointed.

There were certainly forms on horseback rushing in the direction of Ennistone.

She turned to her lover in distress, her eyes gazing wildly at him, her pretty bosom heaving tumultuously, and her whole form trembling so greatly, that she was compelled to lean on him for support.

"Come, let us hasten, Denzil," she whispered; "we are pursued. That is Sir Arthur, I know him even at this distance."

Without another word, he took her unresisting form in his arms, and fled across the road towards the spot where the carriage was awaiting them.

In another moment they were inside, and were being conveyed rapidly towards London.

Those who pursued seemed at first determined to carry out their object.

But after a time, they came to a dead halt, from some reason unaccountable to the pursued, who could not distinguish what was passing in the distance.

The lovers, while the pursuit was continued, kept looking out on either side of the carriage, as it rocked and swayed in its rapid progress along the rough road; but when it ceased, they withdrew by common consent, as it were, from contemplation of outward things, and addressed themselves to the enjoyment of the moment.

Denzil Harcourt's handsome though saturnine face was lit up with a smile of triumph and eager joy, as the young girl sank into his arms, and laying her head on his breast, sobbed violently,

"Clara, dearest," he said, in a low and tender voice, "why weep now, when the danger is past?"

She still clung there.

"I am not weeping at the danger," she said; "I am weeping for joy to think that we have escaped."

Poor girl! she thought only of the roses—nothing of the thorns.

And so they sat for hours, until the green fields had merged into the towns, and the towns into the villages, and the coming presence of the great Babylon was indicated by the immense clouds of smoke which were visible in the horizon, and the distant hum and the disappearance of everything green.

Yet the distinction was scarcely discernible to Clara Arbuthnot; for in the fullness of her young heart she only thought of the exquisite pleasure she experienced from the fact that she was pressed in Denzil's arms, and was soon to be his own for ever.

On the banks of the river Thames, on the Middlesex side, some distance above Vauxhall bridge, stood an old house.

From its peculiar aspect and construction, it formed a landmark or milestone for the bargemen, who slowly floated up and down in their clumsy boats, on the muddy surface of the river.

For the side which faced the river was built out on piles over the water, and the red brick wall stared the navigators full in the face, without a window to enliven and lighten its gloomy appearance.

On the landward side it looked quite as dismal, and much more dilapidated.

For the house was enclosed by a high brick wall, through the iron gateway of which the passer-by might catch glimpses of the tottering chimney-stack; the roof, from which the tiles were dropping one by one; the window-frames rotten and broken; the door, with its rusty iron knocker and blistered paint; the blackened, smoky walls, from which the once carefully trained vine had dropped, as if in disgust at the neglect it had experienced.

The garden was gone to decay; the flower beds were choked with weeds; the lawn appeared not to have been mown for many years, and was overgrown with a long, dank vegetation, and the gravel walk was covered with green moss.

It was a large house, and contained a great many apartments.

But it stood for a long time uninhabited, and various rumors were circulated as to the reason.

The superstitious said that the house was haunted; the more morbid-minded said that terrible crimes had been committed there, and that gory stains marked the floor.

Great, therefore, was the surprise of the neighbors when one day two huge vans, laden with furniture, drove up to the gate, and, after some delay, were admitted by an old man, who brought the rusty key in his hand.

But the drivers and attendant men refused to give any information about the house, although they were strictly cross-examined by the publican who supplied them with beer.

From that time, three rooms in the old house were furnished.

The old drawing-room, and its dull, paneled walls, were once more lit up by the cheerful light of a fire; and the large apartment looked splendid with its luxurious easy chairs, sofas, pictures, and Brussels carpets.

One of the bedrooms, too, was furnished in a most magnificent style, with every luxury and convenience that could invite sleep and make dark night pleasant.

Another bedroom was fitted up more plainly, being intended for a servant.

So that the old house was to be again inhabited was a matter of profound speculation to the neighbors, and no one seemed able to solve the mystery.

It was at the door of this house that the carriage containing Denzil Harcourt and Clara Arbuthnot drew up about four in the afternoon.

It was growing dark, yet Clara could see, as she glanced from the carriage window, how gloomy and dismal were the walls, and how old and dilapidated was its general appearance.

She could see, too, the muddy river beyond—more wretched-looking from the fact that it was low water, and that mud islands showed themselves in its centre, while great wastes of ooze and slime constituted its banks.

An involuntary shudder passed through the frame of Clara Arbuthnot as Denzil handed her down from the carriage, and led her through the wild and tangled garden into the house.

"Where is this, Denzil?" she asked, timidly.

"This is my house, dearest!" he said. "It is a little out of repair, but that will soon be remedied."

"But the church, Denzil? Remember, you promised we were to be married before I entered your home!"

Denzil smiled.

"Poor little dove!" he said; "why, we could not be married at any church so late as this! In my drawing-room a priest is waiting; in a few moments we shall be man and wife!"

As he spoke, he led her into the drawing-room, where a tall man, attired in a black suit and a white "choker," stood leaning over the fire.

He was a young man, with very light hair, a sallow complexion, and restless eyes.

He bowed lowly and respectfully as the couple entered.

"You are late, Mr. Harcourt!" he said. "I had begun to fear that some accident had happened."

Denzil smiled.

"No," he said; "we were pursued; but our enemies gave it up as a bad job, and here we are."

The priest now lost no time; and in less than half an hour the solemn ceremony had been read, and the ring placed on Clara's finger, and the trio had drawn up to the fire, awaiting dinner.

When, after dinner and coffee, the priest left the newly-married pair together, he contrived to slip a piece of paper into Clara's hand, and to whisper, "Keep this secret—it may be of use to you in the future!"

When Clara retired to the nuptial chamber that night, she eagerly scanned the paper.

It was the marriage certificate.

What could the Rev. John Tollemache mean?

LAST February Mr. Jefferson Davis was urging his armies to "whip the Yankee spaniels back to their kennels." That sentiment he must now feel to be unworthy of his gown.

OFF DUTY.

BEAR him gently along o'er the blood-crimsoned sod,
His spirit has passed to its giver;
With unfaltering feet late the green turf he trod,
And now he's "off duty" for ever.
Smooth back the damp locks from the cold, pallid brow
Of him who to slumber you're leaving,
Bear him lightly along though he'll heed you not now,
Nor waken for sorrow or grieving.
May the soft breezes blow and the bright flowers wave
In the pride of their freshness and beauty;
And the birds of the summer-time sing o'er the grave
Of the soldier of Union "off duty."

Oh, lower him tenderly down to his rest,
And smooth the bright green turf above him,
How still is the heart in the warrior's breast,
No wild storm of battle can move him,
How nobly he fought in his strength and his pride
'Mid the roar of the batteries' thunder.
Lay him silently down near the spot where he died,
The turf of the battlefield under.
May the soft breezes blow and the bright flowers wave
In the pride of their freshness and beauty,
And the birds of the summer-time sing o'er the grave
Of the soldier of Union "off duty."

May-be far away in some fair Northern home
They wait for the soldier who's sleeping;
They will wait and will watch for their hero to come,
Till watching is turned into weeping,
They will wait and they'll weep for the one that they love,
Who far on the battlefield's lying,
Till they join his freed soul in the regions above
Where is never more sorrow nor dying.
May the soft breezes blow and the bright flowers wave
In the pride of their freshness and beauty,
And the birds of the summer-time sing o'er the grave
Of the soldier of Union "off duty."

Let him rest, let him rest, in his slumber so deep,
Where the bright Southern sky arches over,
Far, far from the spot where his kindred will sleep,
'Mid the Northern lands, daisies and clover.
All nerveless the arm that has battled so well,
While the tall grasses over him quiver,
In his warrior grave on the field where he fell,
Let him rest now off duty for ever.
May the soft breezes blow and the bright flowers wave
In the pride of their freshness and beauty,
And the birds of the summer-time sing o'er the grave
Of the soldier of Union "off duty."

A WONDERFUL FISHING STORY.

THE ladies of Paris are great anglers—that is, for small fish. And the gentlemen of highest ton regard the sport with considerable favor. Both ladies and gentlemen admire a drive to the beautiful suburbs of Neuilly and Corbeille, or even to the charming lake at Enghien. I once accompanied a lady to fish at Neuilly, where we purchased gentles for bait, which are the common maggot, bred in meat, and by a peculiarly French process these gentles grow to the length of nearly an inch, and, as they are washed quite clean and white, they form a very attractive bait for either surface or bottom fish. There were many fashionable persons angling there, and while fishing, I was told the following story:

A most accomplished and beautiful young lady of Paris became so fascinated with the refreshing recreation of angling that she was to be seen every fair day at Neuilly with her driver, footman and domestics. Of the numerous gentlemen who visited there to angle, there was one so powerfully smitten by her beauty and grace of manners as to make him desire—above all things—an introduction to her. For that purpose he went day after day a-fishing, in the hope that heaven would point out some way for him to become acquainted with her. Thus he went daily a-fishing until his friends thought him suffering from a coup de soleil which had softened his brain. In vain they endeavored to dissuade him from it. He became so taciturn and almost morose, that his companions of the club thought seriously of taking medical advice in his case. But every day that he went fishing and saw the lady, he was paid for all the taunts and questionable glances of his city associates; while he every day became more anxious as the fishing season was drawing to a close, yet he could meet no one who knew her, and she was so closely barricaded by her servants that he could not approach her to tender her any civility should an occasion offer.

After anxiously waiting and longing each day, the carriage would stop for her, and her servants help her to her seat, and thus hopelessly close the door to her ardent admirer for another day. Thus the hopes of each morning would end in the same cause for despair; and besides, some days he would await her coming all day, and most reluctantly return at night without having even seen her.

His anxiety became very great, and the case hopeless unless he could hit upon some expedient. He had thought of all the modern methods of declaring his passion, but none of them would stand the test of his intellectual crucible, when one morning he was smitten with an inspiration! "I have it!" said he. "I'll do it! She's mine!" He resolved to write a love-letter and swim under the water and catch it to her hook, and give her line a jerk to resemble the bite of a fish, and then retire unperceived and watch the effect of the experiment. He at once commenced practising swimming and remaining under water, and continued practising until he felt sufficient confidence to try the experiment. He wrote the letter, attached it to her hook, gave the line a jerk, and returned up under the bridge, donned his clothes, and arrived in sight of the lady just in time to see her reading the letter, and, swooning, she was caught in her servant's arms and conveyed to her coach.

The next day she went again a-fishing, to see what new dispensation heaven had in store for her. She felt another bite and caught another letter. After several days, and catching a letter each day, she finally saw the fish in the act of biting, and beckoned him to her. In a few minutes he was by her side in tremulous submission, but her responsive look inspired him with hope. She entered her carriage and invited him to a seat; and on their return to Paris (she ordered her coachman to drive slow) an éclaircissement took place, which proved that their families had long been favorably acquainted with each other. Just one month from that day the lady felt again the singular bite, and took the mysterious fish, amidst the congratulations of friends, in the Church of Notre Dame.

THE ROXBURY TRAGEDY.—POSITION OF THE BODY OF MISS ISABELLA N. JOYCE, WHEN FIRST DISCOVERED AFTER THE MURDER IN BUSSEY'S WOODS, WEST ROXBURY, MASS.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. ROBERT D. WILKIE.

THE ROXBURY TRAGEDY.

THE atrocious tragedy which took place in Roxbury, Mass., on the 11th ult., involving the death of John S. and Isabella N. Joyce—the former twelve, the latter fifteen years of age—has, as might naturally be expected, produced a profound impression of sadness and indignation in the public mind. That in a civilized, Christian community, there should live human beings capable of such cruelty savage and fiendish deeds, is almost past belief.

The circumstances of the double murder are briefly as follow: the mother of the children left her residence in Boston early on the morning of the fatal day, for West Roxbury, with the intention of remaining absent from her home three days. She placed her children in charge of their grandmother, who lived on the corner of Newland and Concord streets, Boston. On the day of the murder, Master John S. Joyce went to school as usual, but came home at 11 o'clock in the morning, to go with his sister to May's woods, she having expressed a wish to see if those woods were as lovely as those in Lynn. They were furnished by their grandmother with sufficient change to enable them to pay their fares, and left the roof of that beloved grandparent in high glee, little thinking of the terrible fate awaiting them. It is supposed, that instead of taking the Warren street car, which would have carried them near May's woods, the children took the Forest Hill car, and went to Bussey's woods by mistake, where, during the afternoon, they were murdered by some unknown fiend, who, previous to taking the lives of the children, violated the person of the girl.

The monster who committed the murder, literally cut the children in pieces. The wounds on the person of the girl—twenty-seven in number—were in different places, extending from the hips to the breast-bone, and one or two on the back. From an examination of the body, Dr. Stedman was led to infer that but one person was engaged in the outrage. The wounds were deep, and were made evidently by the same instrument that killed the boy. The young girl must have made a desperate struggle to free herself from the hands of the villain, as the leaves and ground near the rock are clotted with blood, from the twenty-seven wounds received upon her body, from a large dirk knife, sixteen of them being upon her back. The excitement is intense in the vicinity of the murder, and hundreds of sympathizing people visit Bussey's woods daily, many of them decorating the spot where the children lost their lives, with flowers. Suspicion rest on several parties as knowing something in connection with the crime, and several arrests have been made.

The following letter from our special artist, gives some additional particulars concerning the tragedy:

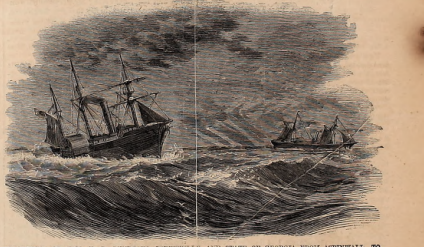
LOSS OF THE CENTRAL AMERICAN TRANSIT COMPANY'S STEAMSHIP GOLDEN RULE, CAPT. DENNIS, ON ROncador REEF, CARIBBEAN SEA, MAY 30.—FROM A SKETCH BY A PASSENGER.

BOSTON, June 23d, 1865.

MR. LESLIE:—I send you some most interesting sketches concerning the recent murder; they are correct in every particular—as far as the land and woods, and position of the bodies as found, are concerned. On reaching the spot yesterday, I was unfortunately prevented from making more than one sketch, on account of a severe thunder-storm, so had to go again this morning, and found that some kind hands had placed a wreath of flowers on the spot where the poor girl's head had rested, and beneath was strewn in a circle a profuse quantity of flowers, which completely hid from view the blood-saturated moss and leaves which lie crushed around, expressive of the shocking agony the unfortunate young girl must have suffered. The body of the brother was found in the spot which I have represented, lying on his face, evidently dragged there after the fiendish deed was done. The place is very swampy, with small pools of standing water; this spot is some distance from the murder scene of the sister. The public road running directly behind the ledge of rocks, you will note standing up behind the wreath in the sketch. The whole affair is wrapped in the most profound mystery, and unnumbered police are working night and day on it. Arrests are still continuing, to what effect remains to be seen. In haste, yours obediently,

ROBERT WILKIE.



THERE is an allegorical story current, that once, immediately after Theodore Parker had parted from Ralph Waldo Emerson, on the road to Boston, a crazy Millerite encountered Parker, and cried, "Sir, do you know the world is coming to an end?" Upon which Parker replied: "My good man, that doesn't concern me, I live in Boston." The same fanatic, overtaking Emerson, announced in the same terms the approach of the end of the world; upon which, Emerson replied: "I am glad of it, sir; man will get along much better without it!"

DR. SCHWARZ communicates the following simple method of preserving small quantities of ice which he has practised with success. Put the ice in a deep dish or jug, cover it with a plate, place the vessel on a pillow stuffed with feathers, and cover the top with another pillow carefully, by this means excluding the external air. Feathers are, it is well known, bad conductors of heat, and in consequence the ice is preserved from melting. Dr. Schwarz states that he has thus preserved six pounds of ice for eight days. The plan is simple, and within the reach of every household.

WHAT letter is it that is never used more than twice in America?—Letter A, of course.

THE CROSS.

BY C. G. ROSENBERG.

He who through the world would go
Stainless with its dust and woe,
Like the Christ the cross must bear—
The gall must taste—the thorn must wear,
Whose pains his throbbing forehead tear—
Yet, like the Christ, knew no despair.

Hard the riddle is to know—
Hard, unsolved through life to go—
Hard, that heavy cross to bear—
The gall to taste—the thorn to wear
Yet not to find what signs the air,
But sings the riddle's answer there.

Not a flower on earth can blow—
Not a single fountain flow—
Not a rivulet make flow
Its tender green to ray and air—
Not one green leaf the sunshine share,
But must it that riddle's key declare.

He who through the world will go
Open-eyed, may shun the woe.
Love is working everywhere—
In fire, in water, in air;
Love alone the cross may bear,
Yet, like the Christ, know no despair.

CHAPTER XXII.—CONTINUED.

The drive between Twickenham to Stanscroville is not a very long one; and Mrs. Trodethyn's hays got over the ground at a pace that did credit to the judgment of Mr. Lowther, who had chosen the animals for his friend. It was nearly nine o'clock when the hansoms drew up before the dorie colonnade, where a group of fluttering damsels to Maude's dining-room; and before the three ladies could alight, a handsome cab flashed up to the carriage, a pair of steaming doors were flung open, and Francis Trodethyn sprang out upon the pavement.

His wife's face flushed crimson, and then grew deadly pale. She turned to Rose Grunderson, and murmured in faint, hurried accents:

"Will you dine with us, Rosa? or shall Marmaduke drive you home?"

"Thank you, my darling," Miss Grunderson answered promptly; "I think I'll come in just for a few moments."

Maude nodded and entered the hall. Francis had handed her from the carriage, and followed her into the house. He threw away his cigar as he stepped on the hall, and regarded his wife with rapidly with good spirits and perfumed with tobacco.

"I'm so glad you've come home," he said. "I thought you were going to dine with the governor, and that I should have to sit in that dreary room all by myself, with only Landseer's staghounds to keep me company; though if half the people one calls company were as much alive as they are, a dinner-party wouldn't be such a dismal business as it is. Of course you haven't dined—you must have I am perfectly sure there doesn't seem to be any dinner," added Mr. Trodethyn, as he opened the door and looked into the dining-room, where the table was bare and ghastly under the faint glimmer of gas. "No one was expected, I suppose? However, they can get me something, Geoffreyes, just see about dinner, will you? How do you do, Miss Grundersen? I dare say you are hungry after your drive. Are you going upstairs, Maude?"

"Yes," answered Mrs. Trodethyn.

The syllable had a startling effect as it fell from her lips, like one solitary drop of ball falling suddenly on a summer day.

"I am upstairs," said Miss Desmond confidentially to Rosa; "will you come with me and take off your things?"

"So, thanks, dear," answered Miss Grundersen, who would have endured tortures rather than say "thank you" after the fashion required that she should say "thanks." "I don't think I will take off my things. Mrs. Trodethyn doesn't seem very well, and it's almost late for dinner; so I think I'll just go up to the morning-room and rest for a few minutes before I go home. His carriage need not be kept, you know, please," added Miss Grundersen to a maid somewhat hovering in the shadowy depths of the hall; "for I can have a cab fetched when I want to go."

Mr. Trodethyn had followed his wife to the drawing-room door, the two girls standing at the foot of the staircase heard one of the doors close with a sonorous bang.

Miss Desmond went upstairs, and Miss Grundersen followed slowly. The morning-room of which Rosa had spoken was on the second floor, but the young lady did not go any further than the first landing-place. The door of the front drawing-room was closed, but the door of the back drawing-room was half wide open, and peering into the lighted apartment, Rosa saw that it was quite empty. She paused for a moment, looked about her, and then went quietly into the back drawing-room, and closed the door very softly behind her.

Francis Trodethyn followed his wife to the drawing-room beacons that one frozen syllable, together with the strange expression of her face, had been quite enough to tell him that something was wrong.

"Maude," he said, as he closed the drawing-room door, "you speak to me and look at me as if you were offended. And yet I have no consciousness of having done anything to displease you."

Mrs. Trodethyn looked at her husband with supreme contempt; not the cool scorn which is akin to indifference, but rather a passionate disdainfulness. Taking into consideration the fact that Maude did not care for her husband, all disdainful nine rage seemed a sad waste of feeling.

"Do not add hypocrisy to the wrong that you have done me," said Mrs. Trodethyn. "I have been most cruelly awakened this day to a knowledge of the life you have been leading—ever since our marriage. I cannot speak of this subject; it is too horrible; I think the words would choke me. I thought that I should have been able to write what I had to tell you; but since I have been so unfortunate as to meet you, I may as well say with my own lips what I meant to have said in a letter. It is very little. I have only to tell you that from this moment we must be strangers to each other. After my discovery of to-day, I should consider myself a base and degraded creature if I ever suffered your hand to touch mine in friendship again. The obligation of my father's debt to you must rest upon him henceforward, and not upon me."

"But, Maude, explain yourself! your discovery of to-day, you say! What discovery?"

"Your affections of unworthy treachery is deeper insult than your—No, I will not discuss this subject with you!" cried Maude, passionately. "It is shameful—it is cruel—that I should have been wronged so basely, when I trusted you as completely. Do not speak to me again, I beg; not touch me!" she exclaimed, shrinking away from him with a shudder; your presence inspires me with disgust and abhorrence. Why do you not take your own presence of inhabiting this house, which has only afforded you an outsidable shelter, while your amusements and your friends have been found elsewhere? I set you free from this hour, Mr. Trodethyn. Seek for happiness after your own fashion—which is that of a fool—but spending none to say to you."

Francis from the room before her husband could arrest her. Unspeakably bewildered by her passionate words, which were almost meaningless to him, Francis Trodethyn stood motionless as a statue a few paces from the doorway by which his wife had just left him. He was standing there when the luminous curtains which hung in folds across the archway between the drawing-rooms were cautiously divided, and a plump little figure in black satin appeared between the crimson draperies. The Cornishman heard the rustling, and turned abruptly towards the portière.

"Yes," exclaimed Miss Grundersen, "it's me no, it's I—yes, and I've been listening," continued the young lady, with charming candour, in reply to inquiring stare. "But do say that you forgive me, please, and believe that I meant it for the best," she added, with a little pitying upon my face, a somewhat rather obscure under the influence of excitement.

"What, in heaven's name, does it all mean, Miss Grundersen?" asked Francis piteously.

"Goodness gracious knows—I don't; but it's very certain there is something wrong, and whatever it is, that Mr. Lowther is at the bottom of it."

"Harcourt Lowther?"

"Yes. He has been a great deal of gossip at the Bell and Horns clubs, and such places; and he always tells me every thing he hears. And, Mr. Trodethyn, if you know any how I have wished to speak my mind to you, I am sure you would forgive me for listening just now."

"Oh, I forgive you, certainly; could you have to say to me?" asked the bewildered Cornishman.

"Oh, lots of things. But then you know the grand maxim in society is that you mustn't speak your minds. But to-night the case has come, and I've spoken it. Oh, you poor dear thing," cried Rose, in a sudden outburst of sympathy, "how could you ever suppose that I would abet it?"

"Talked about—by whom, when, and where?"

"By everybody, always, everywhere. You don't know—how could you, I'm sure? But I've just listened to what was going on around you—how people do talk. They've talked about your dissipation, and your going to the play when you have been seen at, the people you have been seen with—about your coming home in hansom cabs in the middle of the night—and about your having vehicles could be invented for people who stay out late, or at least for dears made to open differently. I have wished to be one myself sometimes. They've talked about your getting tipsy," exclaimed Rose, adding that last accusation with a hurrying of wordons stress upon the obnoxious word; "and they've said you were drinking yourself into an early grave, and that false friend—you'll excuse my using you on to your death in order that he might marry your wife afterwards."

Harcourt Lowther—to my death—and—marry Maude! oh, no, no, no; it is too horrible!" gasped Francis, staring at Miss Grundersen, with his head clasped in his hands, and his heads of perspiration upon his brow.

"I know it is horrible," cried Rosa; "but they say it; and you must own it was not a wise thing for you to be so very intimate with a man who was such a favourite with your wife, you know her."

"Engaged to my wife! Who was engaged to my wife?"

"Why, Harcourt Lowther, of course! Didn't you know all about it?"

"No, so help me heaven!"

"Then I'm very sorry I've spoken," said Rose, who had said had been spoken in perfect good faith; but, all at once, she began to see that mischief might come of this free interchange of confidences.

"I thought that you knew it," she stammered, somewhat unable confusion, "or I'm sure I should never have said one word about—"

How did you come to know it?" asked Francis, turning fiercely upon the terrified Rosa.

"Miss Desmond told me."

"It is a lie, a malicious lie, invented by Julia Desmond!"

"I dare say it is something in the way of a story," responded Miss Grundersen, who was very anxious to extinguish the sudden conflagration which her unconscious hand had fired; "people do tell such stories, you know; not that I think Miss Desmond would speak so positively unless but I'm sure if Mrs. Trodethyn says ever engaged to Mr. Lowther she had quite forgotten him when she married you; sairy, if it was so, I don't think it was quite honorable of him to be so friendly with you without telling you all about it."

"Yes," he thought, as he sank moodily down into the nearest chair, and covered his face with his hands, as heedless of Miss Grundersen's presence as if that young lady had been one of her father's cabbage—yes, it is no lie of Julia Desmond's. A hundred recollections arise in my mind to bear witness to its truth. Maude's confession that there was a man whom she had loved, but whose poverty was a hindrance to a marriage with him. Harcourt Lowther's letters from that beautiful heiress—Lowther's return to Cornwall with her him and happiness. I know that they had known each other before he called for Mr. Dimond's Lord; but I believed him implicitly when he told me casually one day that they had never been more than the most indifferent acquaintances. O, God of heaven! what a fool I have been; and how clearly I can see my folly, now when it is too late! False wife, false friend! so Maude's words had only helped trusted."

"Miss Grundersen," said Francis, presently, "whatever the world may have said against Harcourt Lowther, it is a false and lying world if it ever slandered the goodness and purity of my wife."

"I know that," answered Rose, becoming oneself again, and looking up at the sweet daughter that ever were, she's the sweetest and the dearest. And how should she know that people made nasty remarks? I'm sure that Mr. Lowther's always happening to go to the parties she went to, and having here cleiner than other people, and so on—"

"He went to parties!" cried Francis. "He told me that his lateal parties; that he scarcely went any where."

"Ah, but he did, though; and it has been his habit ever since he came to be a swell, you know, but his way of saying them; his empressancing, you know, that has caused these ill-natured remarks about him," added Rose, thinking she was speaking like empressancing."

Francis did not answer. Little by little the mists cleared away from his mental vision; and he saw that Harcourt Lowther had been from first to last the subtlest enemy who ever plotted the ruin of an honest blockhead.

"I have thought—when my tempter gave me the to think that Mr. Lowther's coldness and reserve which separated us; but I know now that it was the schemer's work from first to last. She did not love me. O, God! I have pity upon my poor fool-hood heart. She loved him perhaps; but I might have had some little chance of winning her love if I had remained a friend to—for—her slave, her worshipper; but he has held me away from her, and now she abhors me. She has no feeling but disgust and horror for the man who has deliberately used her to waste his days on a race-course, his hours in the society of a gunning-master."

"If Maude had loved me," Francis agreed, brooding moodily upon his wrongs, "my money would have tempted me to no villainy; my ingenuity would have beguiled me into no danger. Her vices would have regulated my life; her counsel would have given me wisdom. For such love as I wish would have been my law. And it would have been very hard if the companionship of a lady had led me into evil courses, or into a gambler's hell. But what are the people with whom I have herded since my marriage—the sharpers and sinners whom Harcourt Lowther has chosen for me.

"I thank you heartily," he said at last to Miss Grundersen, who had been spoken so frankly to that it is only right that I should be acquainted with the common talk about the man whose hand I have accepted in friendship. I know, if you say for the last twelve months. But I hope you will believe that, whatever Mr. Lowther may or may not be, my wife is good and pure, worthy of the warmest affection you can feel for her. Your warmth of feeling has touched me deeply, Miss Grundersen. I have been true to you as an atmosphere lately. But that I must be dull indeed if I were not affected by your friendly candour. If—if anything should happen to separate Maude and me, I should be very glad to think she had such a friend as you. Shall—if ever I am—if anything so sad as I have trusted, in the truth and honor of Harcourt Lowther, you would stand between her and that dangerous adventurer, what false friend—would you, Miss Grundersen?"

"I would," answered Rosa valiantly; "I should speak up right to her and to Mr. Lowther into the bargain, as candidly as I have spoken it to you so-night."

"I believe you would," said Francis; "and now, my dear, God bless you, and good-night."

He took both his hands and clasped Rosa's pudgy little paws in a brief grasp, and then stood past her on his way towards the door.

"You're not going to dine with me, you, Mr. Trodethyn?" she asked anxiously, "it is so very late."

Poor little Rosa was rather alarmed by that resolute stride towards the door, which might only be the first step in some ghastly vengeance to be taken upon Harcourt Lowther by the stalwart Cornishman.

"I am only going to my room to write a letter," answered Mr. Trodethyn; "shall I ordermy wife's carriage for you?"

"No, thank you; as our house is so near, I think I'll ask one of your servants to see me home," replied Rosa, who had no idea of leaving the ground just yet. "I'll run up to Mrs. Trodethyn's room and say good-by. Shall I take her any message from you?"

"None, thank you; good-night."

"Good-night,"

CHAPTER XXXII.—THE LADY AN ESTIEMAN.

THE letter which Francis Trodethyn wrote in his study was a long one—a very painful one to write, as it seemed from the face of the writer, and the weary sigh which every now and then escaped from his lips, as his hurrying pen paused for a moment. It was close upon ten o'clock when he finished the letter. The clock chimed the half hour after eleven while he was sealing it. He addressed the envelope, and then threw himself back in his chair to think. He had so much to think of. Maude's extraordinary conduct, Rosa Grundersen's revelation, had overthrow the whole fabric of his life; and he found himself surrounded by ruins, and no other chaos he could not contemplate without bewilderment.

For the last few weeks his thoughts had been almost exclusively devoted to his cousin Susan and her wrongs. She had a sad story to tell Robert Leslay, and in musing how to tell it that Francis Trodethyn had put together, piece by piece, was the letter which had been written from St. Petersburg by the man whom Susan had loved and trusted—the man whose diary had revealed to Francis the utter worthlessness of his character.

Robert Leslay's letter was only a worthy communication to Bellair's diary. In it he coldly and deliberately told the girl who loved him, that she was not his wife; that the Marylebone marriage was a mockery; that the registrar was a retired official, but a scoundrel hired for a twenty-pound note to play the part of that functionary; that the registrar's office had been an office, but a lodging-house parlor hired for the occasion, and half-a-dozen doors from the office. This statement was, of course, accompanied by all the harsh locksmen sophistries which can so glibly from the pen, as if all he could learn from the lips of an utterly heartless man. The self-confessed betrayer pleaded the weakness of an all-absorbing love, the storm and sweetness of a timid poverty, the pressure of family circumstances, the fear of a father's rage; and then, in conclusion, the writer stated the pitiful stipend which he was prepared to offer to the woman he had abandoned and the child he had deserted.

Susan showed her cousin this letter, and told him how, after receiving it, her mind had almost overwhelmed by the burden of her great agony. Then it was that she had gone to Mrs. Dimond, and had written to her father a long letter, telling them something of her story, but not all, appealing piteously to the only friend in the world could appeal, for faithful Frank was far away in some unknown quarter. She did not receive the letter she had waited, at first with a faint sickly hope, then with a blank despair, for some answer from the old farm to which she had appealed. Day succeeded day and when her little stock of money had sunk to the lowest ebb, she left the dull quiet of Cotton-ales gh to begin a weary, lonely, miserable period, which had endured, without one ray of sunlight or illumine to the misery, until the summer Sunday afternoon on which Francis Trodethyn found her sitting in the nurse's cottage with her baby in her arms.

It was so sad a story, and so sadly common, that there is little need to dwell upon the unvarnished record of a woman's battle with poverty in the heart of a great city.

"Perhaps I ought to think myself very happy, Frank," Susan had said, when she had told her story, "for I was always able to pay the nurse somehow for the care of my darling; and the deadly fear of the last few days is one that was the worst I knew in all that dreary time. I have been face to face with starvation, Frank, very often within the last two years, but it is not a horror that any one is used to it. I have sometimes thought that their strange fear of me must have been only a blessing in disguise, for it kept me from borrowing upon my great sorrow—it sometimes shut out from me the thought of Robert's cruelty and my own disgrace."

"Disgrace!" cried the Cornishman; "no, Susan, there is no disgrace or degree upon you, except the disgrace of being united to a scoundrel and a liar. The marriage before the registrar was a mere fide mockery, as binding as if it had been performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury."

And then Francis told Susan of his visit to the registrar's office. This was the balm which he was able to pour into the deepest wound that ever bled a woman's heart. But the identity of the husband who had left her was a consideration in her was entirely unknown to Susan. In all the familiar correspondence of that period in which the trusting girl had been a petted and happy child, Robert Leslay had not let fall one careless word relating to his family or his prospects. When first consulted by Francis upon the contents of the diary, Mesgra. Dimond & Sandbach had instituted inquiries as to whether a Mr. Robert Leslay had been inscribed on the books of St. Boniface any time between the years 1843 and the summer of 1844, but in the negative. No person of the name had been a member of that college within the last ten years. Francis could only conclude, therefore, that Mrs. Bartfield had been right in her suppostion that the name assumed by himself Robert Leslay shielded his identity under a false name.

"But your husband was visited by his brother, was he not, Susan?" when this subject was discussed between the cousins.

"Yes; but I know no more of Robert's brother than of Robert himself. He did not come to us often. I have heard that he was a lawyer—a barrister, I think, and that he lived in the Temple. I heard even that by accident, and Robert seemed almost vexed that I should know so much."

All those trifling circumstances seemed to point inevitably to one conclusion: Robert Leslay had intended from the first to abandon his wife, whenever his own interests rendered it advisable that he should throw off the tie that bound him to her. Love and selfishness go very badly hand-in-hand together; and love had even left selfishness sole master of the field.

"But this man shall be made to acknowledge his wife, to give a name to his child," cried Francis, "if he can be found."

"If my husband is alive, Providence may throw him across my path some day," Susan said resignedly. "He could not be more dead to me than he is now, if he were buried in the deepest grave that ever held the ashes of the lost; but if he gave my boy the name that is his right, I think I could forgive him all the past."

It was quite in vain that Francis Tredethlyn sought to carry his cousin and her son home to his own house.

"I am used to poverty, Francis," she said; "let me be poor still. Nobody is inquisitive about me, because I am beneath people's curiosity. No one questions me about the husband who has deserted me, or extorts my story from me only to doubt it when it is told. My father would not believe me; can I expect strangers to be more trusting than he was? No, Francis; leave me alone in my obscurity. I have a lodging near here, and I can see my darling every day. I will freely accept from you a little income which will enable me to live as I have lived, without working as hard as I have worked; but I will accept no more. I am delighted to think that my father left his fortune to you, Frank; and I thank and bless you for having taken so much trouble to find me out."

Francis Tredethlyn found it hard work to win Susan away from this determination, so quietly expressed. But he did at last persuade her to agree to his own plans for her life, on condition that he should tell Maude nothing, nor ask Susan to meet her until the missing husband was found and compelled to acknowledge his wife and son. Francis consented to promise this; but he cherished a hope that Susan would relent by-and-by, when she heard more of Maude's tender and amiable nature, and that he would be able to win his wife's friendship for the simple country girl, who had played with him amongst the daisies in Laudersdale churchyard.

Susan consented to let her cousin do what he liked with regard to the place in which she was to live henceforward. What mother could refuse a bright home for the child she loves?

Energetic though Mr. Tredethlyn was in the carrying out of his arrangements, Susan had been established little more than a week at the cottage, and the paint on the Venetian shutters was still rather sticky, when Harcourt Lowther found the upholsterer's bill, which gave him the clue to his pupil's mysterious conduct. To hasten down to Petersham, find the cottage, refresh himself with dry sherry and soda-water at the nearest tavern was all incomparably easy to Mr. Lowther. From the landlord he had heard all about Brook Cottage. How it had been to let for nearly a twelvemonth; how it had been taken all in a hurry at the end of May by a dashing-looking gentleman from town, who had been reported scouring the neighborhood in hansom cabs, inquiring for houses to let, at three days at a stretch; how painters and glaziers, carpenters and gardeners, had set to work, in hot haste, to renew and revivify everything indoors and out; how wagon-loads of the finest gravel from Wimbledon, and cart-loads of the finest turf from Ham, had been laid down in the garden; how furniture, that was every bit of it new, had been brought down from London; how the tall, dashing, energetic gentleman in the handsome cab had been perpetually on the ground with his officious finger for ever in the pie; and how larger cans of half-and-half had been consumed by the workmen at the cost of the dashing gentleman than the landlord of the Prince's Feathers remembered to have chalked up against any one customer since he had traded as a licensed victualer.

All this Mr. Lowther was told; and beyond this, he heard how a lady, very pretty and quite young, but a little pale and worn-looking, had arrived at last to take possession of "the prettiest little box that was ever put together, without regard to expense;" how she was attended by an elderly female in black, who had evidently seen better days, and who acted as nurse to a little boy; how two respectable women had been hired in the neighborhood, to act as cook and housemaid, and how, coming regularly to the Feathers in quest of the kitchen-beer, they had already reported their mistress as the sweetest and pleasantest of ladies, and first cousin to the dashing gentleman in the hansom cab. The landlord tried to look as if he had no uncharitable thoughts about this cousinship; but Harcourt Lowther saw that Francis Tredethlyn and the lady had been subjects of grave scandal in that quiet country-place. He heard that the dashing gentleman had been at Petersham almost every day for the last week; and that he and the lady passed the greater part of their time in the garden, where they might be seen at any time from the highroad—the gentleman smoking and playing with the little boy, and the lady working, at a rustic table, under a mulberry tree. A potboy, coming in from his rounds as Harcourt lounged at the bar, confirmed the landlord's statement when appealed to. He had passed Brook Cottage not five minutes before, and had seen the lady and gentleman talking to a gardener, who was doing something to a rose tree.

"She's a rare one for flowers, the lady is," the potman said in conclusion.

A rare one for flowers, Harcourt Lowther mused gravely.

"Secrecy is only another name for guilt," thought Mr. Lowther. "Our friend has gone to the bad in real earnest this time, and I can make a coup. I was getting very tired of the slow game."

Armed with this information, the schemer went back to town, to take his place in Maude's opera-box, and to lead up to that idea of a morning at the Cedars, which seemed to originate in Mrs. Tredethlyn's own brain. Chance had been constant to the schemer even in that interview between Francis and Rosa; for it happened that, in all Miss Grunderson's candid outpourings, she had not dropped a word about Mrs. Tredethlyn's stroll in the Petersham meadows; though, even if she had done so, the Cornishman might have been very slow to perceive that an accidental glimpse of himself and gentle Susie, in friendly companionship, could have been the primary cause of that stormy greeting which he had received at the hands of his wife. Francis accepted his wife's passionate outbursts as only the climax of the disgust and weariness with which he had inspired her.

"She reproaches me for the life I have been leading lately," he said bitterly; "but she does not understand her own feelings. It is not my life, but me she hates. It is myself that inspires the loathing and contempt which she talked of, and not my late hours or my gambling and horse-racing."

After sitting for some time plunged in a gloomy reverie, in the dreary library, the little black-marble clock on the mantel-piece chimed a quarter after twelve; he felt in his waistcoat-pocket for a note which he had found waiting for him, on his table, the previous night. It was a tiny twisted poulet from Harcourt Lowther.

"DEAR FRANK,—A line to remind you of to-morrow night. You will be expected any time of after nine, Yours always,
"H. L."

This reminder referred to a bachelor's supper which Mr. Lowther had arranged at his lodgings—a party at which there was to be what the host called a quiet rubber. Francis looked from the clock on the chimney-piece to the scrap of paper in his hand; hesitated for a few moments, with a black frown upon his face, and then started hastily from his lounging attitude, and looked about for his hat.

"There couldn't be a better opportunity," he muttered, "for saying what I want to say to him."

CHAPTER XXXIII.—A HASTY RECKONING.

HARCOURT LOWTHER had never played so bad a rubber as that with which he beguiled the evening while waiting Francis Tredethlyn's appearance at the little bachelor-party assembled in his rooms.

He was thinking of Maude.

Was he near his triumph? He had been playing for two stakes—the woman he loved and the fortune he envied. He knew Maude Tredethlyn well enough to know that so long as her husband lived she was as far beyond his reach as the stars which shone down upon him as he walked home from Stuccoville, and of whose light he thought so little. Maude, as the daughter of an insolvent trader, was a lovely being whom he had felt no reluctance to resign; for he had looked forward, with a horrible foresight, to the day when the girl he loved should be again within his reach, no longer as a penniless spinster, but a wealthy widow. This had been the goal which Harcourt had seen at the end of that weary road along which he conducted the young man who trusted him. No physician ever watched a patient more intently than Mr. Lowther watched the slow undermining of the Cornishman's glorious constitution under the influence of late hours and hard drinking.

Before twelve o'clock Mr. Lowther had abandoned his place at the whist-table to his brother; and after lounging behind the chair of a young man who was playing écarté, and making a random bet now and then, the host proposed supper—a proposition which was received very warmly by the men who were losing money, and very cooly by the winners.

So far as the guests went, the supper was a success. There was just the amount of confusion which gives a picnic flavor to a meal, and which seems an invaluable stimulant of animal spirits. Mr. Lowther's visitors enjoyed themselves immensely, and the party was becoming boisterous in its gaiety, when the door was opened and Francis Tredethlyn walked in.

Harcourt Lowther pushed away the Moselle case, which was now only filled with tumbled straw and empty bottles, and called for a chair, which was edged into a corner at the host's right hand.

"You'll have some supper Tredethlyn?"

"You needn't order anything more—for me. I shan't eat supper to-night," was the reply.

The Cornishman's colorless face and disordered hair and dress might have suggested the idea that he had been drinking; but there was an inscrutable something in that white face which was not compatible with drunkenness. Harcourt Lowther looked at him nervously. The marital quarrel had come off, evidently, and Francis took matters very seriously.

"Come, Mr. Troublefeast," cried the host, "we're not going to stand this sort of thing, you know. We'll have no statue of the commander stalking in upon us in the midst of our fun—without Mozart. What the deuce is the matter with you, dear boy? Roderick, pass that tankard this way, will you? Take a long dip into that, old fellow, and come up bright again."

Mr. Lowther struck his small white hand lightly upon his friend's shoulder as he concluded. Francis had dropped into the place offered to him, and sat there looking like nothing but the commander in his stony rigidity of face and figure. As Harcourt Lowther's hand alighted on his shoulder, he startled every one by throwing it deliberately away from him.

"I have had enough of your friendship, thank you," he said; "henceforward, if we are to be anything at all to each other, I had rather we should be foes—I may have better luck perhaps that way."

"Tredethlyn! are you drunk, or mad?"

"Neither; but I have been both, for I have trusted you. You needn't ask me what I mean," said Francis, interrupting Harcourt Lowther's exclamation by a rapid gesture of his uplifted hand, "I am going to tell you, and very plainly. Gentlemen, you were going to listen to a song just now; have you any objection to hearing a story instead? There will be time for your ballad afterwards, you know, Philcote. My story is not a long one."

"Sing your song, Philcote," said Harcourt Lowther, resolutely, "we want no stories—we've no time for twaddle of that sort. Let's have a good song or two, and then we'll go into the next room for a rubber."

"Let's have the story first and the 'Last Rose' afterwards," suggested some one. "Fire away, Tredethlyn; your audience have supped luxuriously, and are in good humor."

"I daresay it's a common story enough in your set, Boystock," answered Francis; "but it isn't a long one. It is the story of a man who was lifted one day from poverty to wealth, and found himself all at once alone in a world as strange to him as if he had been transported out of this planet into another inhabited by a different species."

"Egad," muttered Mr. Boystock, "I wish somebody would transport me."

"Ah, it isn't likely, old fellow, in that way," murmured his neighbor.

"For some time the country-bred cub—he was country-bred, and what you would call a cub—got on well enough. He floundered into a few mistakes, and he floundered out of them, after his own ignorant fashion. I think there is a providence for such men, as there is for drunkards, and so long as they stagger along alone, they come to very little grief. He did a great many silly things with his money, I daresay; but I think he once did a generous thing—though God knows, in doing it, he only followed the blind impulse of his undisciplined heart as ignorantly as if he had been some blundering Newfoundland dog that pulls the mistress he loves out of the water where he sees her drowning. His wealth prospered with him, though he had cared little enough for it when it fell into his hands. By means of it he was able to save the woman he loved from a great trouble; and in her boundless gratitude for the service which he valued so lightly, she abandoned herself to the purest impulse that ever stirred a noble breast, and offered him her hand. If he had been generous or wise, he would have refused the hand which could not give him a heart. He was only—in love. Selfishly, stupidly, he seized the proffered sacrifice; too besotted in his blind passion to perceive that it was a sacrifice."

"The country-bred cub was still fresh to the intoxication of his fancied happiness, when a man who had been familiar with him in his poverty, came from the distant part of the world, where they had met and known each other, and offered to be his friend. The cub's ignorance of life was so complete that he did not know it was possible for a man who bore her majesty's commission, and called himself a gentleman, to be a liar and a villain. He trusted his old acquaintance implicitly, and accepted him as a friend—believing still, in his boorish ignorance, that there was such a thing as friendship, or, at the worst, an honorable good fellowship between honest men. His friend did not tell him that he had been the engaged lover of the woman the boor was going to marry, and when the young couple began their new life, he planted himself in their house; and his first act was to shut the husband from the home whose dingiest room was a paradise, so long as it was sanctified by the presence of an idolised wife. Will any one at this table guess the plot which the boor's friend hatched against him in the hour when their hands first met in friendship? I think not. The gentleman—polished, well-born, highly educated—allowed the country cub to marry the woman he loved, reserving to himself the hope of marrying her, enriched by the cub's money, when the cub was dead. This once arranged, there was only one thing more to be settled, and that was the cub's life. Unluckily he was a brawny six-feet fellow, with the constitution of a prize-fighter. But then prize-fighters are not always long-lived. The gentleman resolved that the boor should drink himself to death,"

"Is this the plot of a French novel?" asked Roderick superciliously, after a brief silence, in which Francis Tredethlyn had paused to take breath; "if it is, you had better tell us the title of the book, and let us read it in the original. There may be some chance of our thinking it interesting then."

"There are shameful things done out of novels as well as in them, Mr. Lowther," answered Francis. "What I am telling you is the truth. The gentleman took the wealthy boor under his protection, and from that hour the cub's mind and the cub's body began to wither under the influence of a vice, which, of himself, he held in abhorrence, but which, in the dull indifference of a man who has no hope to elevate him, no aim to strive for, he was weak enough to accept as the cure for all his troubles. What did it matter how many glasses of brandy he drank, or how often he staggered across his dreary threshold in the early morning, stupefied by foul gas-lit atmosphere and bad wines? His friend took care to remind him that there was no one to be sorry for his misdeeds, or to rejoice in his repentance if he repented. He could not sink so low that his wife would be affected by his degradation; he could not rise so high that she would be proud of his elevation. His friend dinned the bitter truth into the wretch's ear. The beautiful young wife despised him; the wealth that other men envied was useless to him, except in its power to buy the oblivion of the brandy-bottle. From the hour in which his well-born friend took him under his protection, the boor never did a generous action, or heard a noble sentiment; and he very rarely went home sober. He was drinking himself to death as fast as a strong man can, when Providence took compassion on him, and gave him a duty to fulfill. A helpless girl, his kinswoman, was thrown across his path, and all at once he found himself of use in the world. From that moment his friend's scheme was overthrown. Good-bye to the brandy-bottle and the bad wines! The boor had a friendless woman dependent on his protection, and he had something to live for. He determined to sink the past, bid farewell to the wife whose affection he was unable to win, turn his back upon the circle he had lived in, and the people who had known him, and finish his days honestly among honest men."

"So he died, and she very imprudently married the barber," exclaimed Mr. Boystock. "It's a very good story, I daresay, but apropos to what?" demanded the gentleman, looking at Harcourt Lowther with a malicious twinkle in his little black eyes. "I don't see the connection with the proverbial bottes. What does it all mean?"

"It means, gentlemen, that I am the boor who has been the dupe of a villain, and will be so no longer; and the name of the villain is Harcourt Lowther."

There was a moment's silence, followed by a sudden smashing of glass. A pair of small sinewy white hands fastened cat-like upon Francis Tredethlyn's throat, and he and Harcourt Lowther were grappling each other in a fierce struggle. It was very long since the gentleman had been weak enough to get into a passion. He had sat as still as a statue while the Cornishman set forth his indictment, waiting to see how completely he had failed; and now he knew that his plot, so deliberately laid, so patiently carried out, was only a bungling business after all—for the man must have bungled who fails so utterly—Mr. Lowther lost his head all in a moment, and abandoned himself to a sudden access of rage, that reduced him to the level of a wounded tiger.

It was scarcely with Francis that he was angry. What did it matter how this man spoke of him or thought of him? It was against himself—against his own failure—that Harcourt Lowther's fury was raging; only, like all fury of that kind, it was ravenous for vengeance of some sort. It was only for about twenty seconds that his claws were fastened on Francis Tredethlyn's throat. A Cornish heavy-weight is not exactly the kind of person for a delicately-built Sybarite to wrestle with very successfully.

"We are rather celebrated for this sort of thing in my country," Mr. Tredethlyn muttered between his set teeth, as he loosened Harcourt Lowther's grasp from his throat, and hurled him in a kind of bundle to a corner of the room, where he fell crashing down amongst the ruins of a dumb-waiter, half-buried under a chaos of broken bottles and lobster shells.

Roderick Lowther would have sprung upon his brother's foe in the next minute, but the other men hustled round him and hemmed him in.

"Don't you see the fellow's a Hercules?" cried one of them; "let him alone, Lowther."

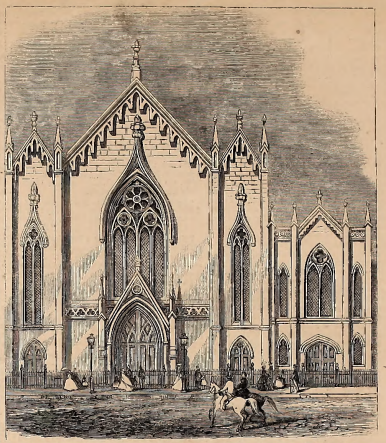
"Let me go," roared the diplomatist, "I know my brother's a false-hearted rascal, but I won't stand by and see a Lowther played at ball with by any boor in Christendom. Let me get at him, Boystock, or I shall hurt you." But Francis had walked quietly to the door, and turning, with his hand upon the lock, waited for a moment's pause in the confusion before he spoke.

"Gentlemen," he said, "you are witnesses that your friend attacked me. I have no quarrel with Mr. Roderick Lowther; and as I am the bigger man of the two, there would be no credit for either him or me in a scuffle between us. If Harcourt Lowther wants to see me, he will be able to find me any time this week at the Grand Hotel, Covent Garden; after this week I shall sail for South America by the first packet that leaves for Liverpool."

He paused a second time. There was no answer. The diplomatist had thought better of his thirst for fraternal retribution.

POLITICAL ASSASSINATION.

THE Queen of England: Queen Victoria can count four attempts on her life. On June 28, 1850, she received a violent blow with a stick from one Robert Pate, a retired lieutenant of the 10th hussars. The Kings of Prussia: In May, 1850, the late King of Prussia received, as he was mounting a railway carriage, a shot from a holster pistol of large bore, in the forearm; the assassin, Sefelage, of Wetzlow, cried out as he fired: "Liberty for ever!" The life of the present King of Prussia was in danger at Baden, on the morning of July 14, 1861. Two pistol shots were fired at him by Oscar Becker, a law student of Leipsic. The regicide declared that he wished to kill the King because he was not capable of effecting the unity of Germany. The Emperor of Austria: On February 18, 1853, at Vienna, Francis Joseph I. was struck with a knife in the nape of the neck. The murderer's name was Libeny, of Albe, in Hungary aged 20, resident at Vienna, and a tailor by trade. The Duke of Parma; On March 20, 1854, Ferdinand Charles III., Duke of Parma, returning from an excursion, was hustled by an individual who at the same time stabbed him in the abdomen, left the poignard in the wound, and subsequently escaped. The Duke expired in cruel torture at the end of 23 hours. The Queen of Spain (a second attempt): On May 28, 1856, as Queen Isabella was passing in her carriage along the Rue de l'Arsenal, at Madrid, a young man named Raymond Fuentes drew a pistol from his pocket, and would have discharged it at her head had not his arm been caught and his weapon taken from him by an agent of the police. The King of Naples: On December 8, 1856, whilst Ferdinand II. was reviewing his troops at Naples, a soldier named Agesilas Milano struck him with his bayonet, and, at a later period Garibaldi honored the memory of the regicide. Napoleon III: In October, 1852, when Napoleon, who was on the eve of becoming Emperor, was at Marseilles, there had been prepared an infernal machine, formed by 250 gun barrels charged with 1,500 balls, intended to go off all at once against the Prince and his cortège. But the attempt was not carried out. On July 5, 1853, a fresh attempt was made to assassinate him as he was going to the Opera Comique. Twelve Frenchmen were arrested as concerned in the conspiracy. On April 28, 1855, Jean Liverani fired two shots at the Emperor in the Grand Avenue of the Champs Elysées. In 1857, Tibaldi, Bartolotti and Grilli, came from England to Paris to assassinate the Emperor, but were discovered, arrested, tried and punished. On January 14, 1858, Orsini, Gomez, Pieri and Rudio, threw their murderous shells at the Emperor of the French, and shed the blood of a great number of honest citizens in Paris. On December 24, 1863, Greco, Trabucco, Imperatore and Scaglioni, who had come over from London with the intention of killing the French Emperor, were arrested in Paris. The Queen of Greece: On September 18, 1862, the Queen of Greece, directing public affairs during the King's absence, was returning from a ride on horseback, when she was fired at without effect, near the palace, by Aristide Dousios, a student, aged 19 years. Victor Emanuel II: In 1858, an attempt was made on the life of this sovereign, and Count Cavour gave an account of it in the sitting of April 16. President Lincoln: On April 14, 1865, at Ford's theatre, Washington, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States of America, was assassinated by Booth.



REV. THOS ARMITAGE, PASTOR OF THE FIFTH AVENUE BAPTIST CHURCH, CORNER OF FIFTH AVENUE AND 45TH STREET, NEW YORK.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

REV. THOMAS ARMITAGE, D.D.

We present in this number the portrait of the Rev. Thomas Armitage, D.D., rector of the Fifth avenue Baptist church, at the intersection of 46th street and 5th avenue, New York. Dr. Armitage was born in England in 1819, and came to America in 1836, at the age of 19 years. He is a scion of the old Armitage stock, which sprang from Sir John Armitage, of Bromley, England, who was made a baron by Charles I. in 1640.

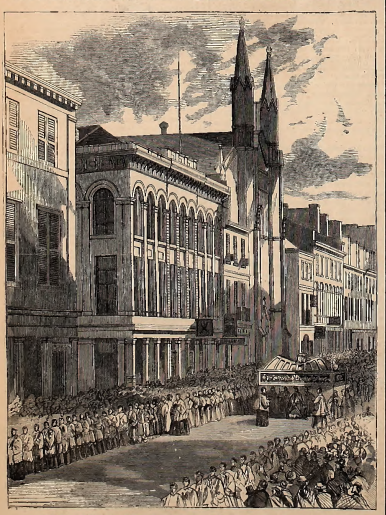
The mother of Dr. Armitage was an exceedingly pious woman of the Methodist persuasion, who died when he was six years of age, making it an especial prayer that her eldest son Thomas "might be converted, and become a good minister of the gospel of Christ."

Dr. Armitage may be justly considered one of the most eminent divines in this country. He is of medium height, well-proportioned, erect figure and bright hazel eyes, which convey an expression of mingled intelligence and kindliness. There are few men of more prepossessing powers of mien and speech. He fascinates strangers and delights friends. The heart and mind fall at once under the influence of his impulsive, generous warmth of manner, and of his kindly, just and liberal sentiments. He stands to the gaze a polished gentleman, and he wins his way to your esteem and affection by exalted worthiness as a man.

FIFTH AVENUE BAPTIST CHURCH, CORNER OF FIFTH AVENUE AND 46TH STREET, NEW YORK. REV. DR. ARMITAGE, PASTOR.

The Fifth Avenue Baptist Church.

This edifice owned by the society formerly known as the Norfolk street Baptist Church, was dedicated on the 18th ultimo. The church and lecture-room buildings occupy an area of 85 by 100 feet, 62 by 75 feet of which is covered by the church edifice proper.



The interior of main building is constructed with side aisles, skeiny columns, and spacious clear story 70 feet high, the ceiling of which is lighted by 14 tracery and stained-glass windows, giving a very pleasing effect. The clear story and side ceilings are richly finished, with groined arches, heavy rib mouldings, etc., and the timber is laid out in blocks, in imitation of stone, and colored gray, three tints. The general style, and the absence of side galleries, present an elegant and cathedral-like appearance.

The lecture-room building is two stories high, the first story being used for lecture-room, committee-room, pastor's and robing-rooms, the whole communicating with the church auditory in the rear. The second story is used exclusively for Sunday-school purposes.

The edifice, which is gothic in style, was built from plans prepared by Messrs. D. & J. Jardine, architects, 1261 Broadway, and under their supervision.

CORPUS CHRISTI PROCESSION PASSING THE AMERICAN CHURCH, MONTREAL, C. E.

LOSS OF THE STEAMSHIP GOLDEN RULE.

THE steamship Golden Rule, belonging to the Central American Transit Company line of California steamers via Nicaragua, left New York May 23d, with 235 passengers, and 4 crew of 190 all told, for San Juan (Greytown). Everything proceeded favorably until the afternoon of the 29th, when the weather became very dark and squally with torrents of rain, which continued through the night. On the morning of May 30, at 5:30, the ship struck on Roncador reef, in the Caribbean sea, in latitude 13 25, longitude 80 54, and in 20 minutes she lifted. About two minutes before the ship struck, he reef was seen, the helm was put hard-a-starboard, the engines stopped, and had made a half-turn back when she struck. Every exertion was made to save the ship, but she came broadside on the reef. At the same time, the engineer reported the breaking of the main steampipe, and the water gaining very fast. The boats were immediately lowered and brought under the lee-side of the ship.

The masts were cut away, and the ship's company at once commenced building rafts for the safety of the passengers and crew. During the day there was a high breeze from the southward with heavy rain squalls and a very heavy swell which completely broke over the ship. In the afternoon Roncador island, about six miles distant from the wreck, was discovered by Mr. Underhill, Chief Engineer, who visited it, and reported it to be some 12 acres in extent, without shrubbery of any kind and uninhabited, except by birds and land crabs.

On the night of the 31st, the ship commenced to break up, and from that time until June 5, the crew were entirely occupied in securing provisions, stores, baggage, mattresses, blankets, etc.

The work of transportation was accomplished without the loss of life.

About half of the baggage and stores was saved, the latter in a very bad condition. At 1, P. M., June 5, a boat was despatched in charge of second officer, Mr. Reid, with the purser, Mr. Rogers, to Aspinwall, 260 miles distant, for assistance.

After being 11 days on the island the passengers and crew of the ill-fated vessel were rescued by the United States gunboats Huntsville and the State of Georgia, which were sent from Aspinwall to their relief. They reached the latter on Sunday, the 11th ultimo, all in good health, and were forwarded at once to San Francisco by the fine steamer America.

The loss of the Golden Rule appears to have been purely accidental, the ship being carried off her course by strong currents.

THE MANSION HOUSE, LONG BRANCH, N. J.

Among the fashionable Summer Hotels of our great Republic, the Mansion House, Long Branch

FABRIC CHURCH, QUEBEC.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY EMELTON.

OUR SUMMER WAVERING PLACES.—LAIRD'S MANSION HOUSE, LONG BRANCH, NEW JERSEY.

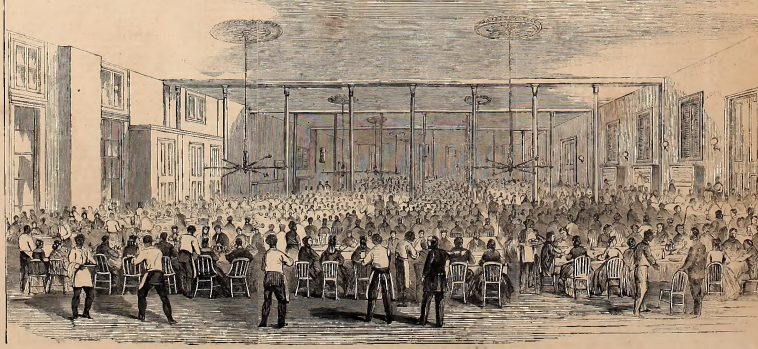
occupies a prominent position, not only on account of the spaciousness of the building, the airiness and comfort of the rooms, the healthfulness of the spot and the beauty of the location, but for that genial air of home which the proprietor, Mr. Laird, throws over it. Our engraving is so accurate, that it relieves us from the trouble of describing the exterior of the building. We shall, therefore, confine our remarks to the dining-room, which is one of the most spacious in this country.

Our readers may get some idea of its size, when we state that its dimensions are 150 feet by 80, and that it will seat over 350 persons. This model dining-room has also the unspeakable advantage of being so situated that the sun cannot reach it, a fact which can be fully appreciated in summer. It is also most effectually ventilated from the roof, with Miller's patent ventilator. All these advantages make it indisputably one of the coolest and pleasantest dining-rooms in the United States. Having already borne our tribute of acknowledgment to the courteous and liberal proprietor, we trust the hostess, Mrs. Laird, will excuse us if we add that she is the greatest attraction of the house, making, by her winning and lady-like manner, her guests, more especially the fairer portion of them, feel like old friends.

Mr. Laird, like all those "who really know how to keep a hotel," has selected able assistants, such as Messrs. Tyler and Fletcher, and Mr. Allen, the steward, one of the most judicious of providers.

Long Branch is so easy of access, and the trip there had back is so pleasant and invigorating, that we know of no other sea resort so admirably adapted for our citizens, as Laird's Mansion House.

POMPEIAN SKELETONS.



ABOUT two years ago, in a small street, the workmen employed in the excavations discovered an empty space of an unusual form, in which were some skeletons. Before disturbing them they called Signor Fiorelli, who was fortunately at hand. A singularly happy thought struck him. He had the empty space filled with liquid plaster of Paris, and repeated the process in the case of some other openings which presented a similar appearance. As soon as the plaster was hardened, the surrounding ashes were carefully removed, and displayed the perfect casts of four human bodies. All four are now placed in the Museum, and a more singular and affecting sight is perhaps not to be seen in the whole world. The plaster was hardened around the ashes so perfectly in the shape of what may be termed the mould formed by the falling ashes round the living bodies, that the whole aspect of the dying frame is preserved, even to the minutest details, except that here and there the bones of the skeleton within are partially uncovered. M. Mo[illegible] contrasts them with Egyptian mummies, which [illegible] and linen, and arranged in an artificial manner for their burial, while in the entombed Pompeii, a few see human beings in the very act of dying.

One of them is the body of a woman, close to whom were found a large number of coins, two silver vases, some keys and some jewels, which she was carrying with her when the falling ashes arrested her flight. It is easy to trace her head-dress and the material of her clothing; and on one of her fingers are two silver rings. Her hands were so clasped in agony that the nails had pierced the flesh. With the exception of her legs, the whole body is swollen and contracted; it is plain that she strove violently in her dying struggle. Her attitude, says M. Mommsen, is that of the last agony, and not that of death. Behind her lay another woman and a girl, evidently of humble rank. On a clasp of the two, probably the mother, has an iron ring on one of her fingers. The signs of a dying struggle are evident, but the death seems to have been easier than in the case of the victim last described. Close to her lies the girl, almost a child in age. The details of her dress are presented with startling faithfulness. One fold sets forward and stitching of her frock. The ornamented coin in her long necklace, the comb over her head, a wisp of the tresses of her hair, and falling locks on her face had rested evidently on one of her arms, and so died apparently without a struggle.

The fourth body is that of a large and powerful man who had sat down to die with his arms and legs straight and fixed. His dress is completely preserved; his hair is close, his sandals are laced to the feet, with nails in their soles. On one finger is an iron ring; his mouth is open, and shows that he had lost some of his teeth; his bone and muscles are strongly marked; the eyes and the hair have disappeared, but the moustache remains. The whole sight is tragic to the last degree. After the hours of it contained the terrible death seems to be enacting itself before us with all its appalling suffering.

We may add what M. Mommsen does not seem to be aware of, that stereoscopic views were taken of the bodies, and that we have seen them in London. The minute details which the actual plaster casts present, are, of course, less visible, even with all the respective powers of the stereoscope; but enough is to be discerned to suggest all the terrors of the dying moments.

GAMBLING IN CHINA.—The Chinese are passionately addicted to gambling, and the endless variety of the games of chance in common use among them does credit to their ingenuity and invention, for it is not likely that they have learned anything from their neighbors. The respectable merchant, who devotes the hours of daylight assiduously to his business, sparing no labor in adjusting trifling items of account, will win or lose thousands of dollars over night with the greatest complacency. Every grade of society is imbued with the passion. I have amused myself by watching the coolie in the streets of Yeddo, gambling for their dinner. The gamblers cooks carry with them, as part of the professional egotism of a culinary establishment, with which they personalize the street, a cylinder of bamboo, round the circumference of which are the described ceremonial characters. These rapidly whirl, shaken up in the tube. So smaller or but imagining drawn one, and according to the writing found on it so does he pay for his repast. So attractive is gambling in any form to the Chinese, that a keen-sighted people will generally prefer to risk paying double for the remote chances of gaining a meal for nothing. On one occasion I volunteered to act as proxy for a hungry cooley, who was about to try his luck. The offer was accepted with enjoyment, and I was fortunate enough to win my countenance without for nothing. I was at once put down as a partner in the black art, and literally found myself a crowd to conduct all begging me to do them a similar favor, which, of course, I gracefully declined. But, indeed be remembered a second time, the dispenser of the bowl of rice would certainly have proved a failure, against my interference as an invasion of his prerogative. Chinese are to win, and not to lose. The success punishes, as, of course, frequently raised by the practice. The cooley who has lost his bowl of rice and every one of his clothes actually undressed in order that they may be sold, and which have started over the Russian boats, who used the gambling table. In the last cruise of all, a dose of opium settles all accounts forthwith of the world. In games of skill the Chinese are no less accomplished. Dominoes, draughts, chess, and cards, are to be seen in full swing at every tea-house, where the people repair to while away the evening. The Chinese are now in these days exhibit intense interest in their competition; the victory is celebrated by a distinctive exhibition of the emotions of any pair of Chinese draught-players may have not to Wilde's sentimental pattern.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

SIR FREDERICK NORTON was noted for his want of courtesy. When pleading before Lord Mansfield on some question of manners right, he observed, in the course of his argument, that "a gentleman in an inn is in my own person." "I have seen fifty," said Lord Mansfield.

The jokes immediately interposed, with one of his blandest smiles, "I have seen it, Sir Fredrick."

WHY should there be more marriages in winter than summer? Because in winter the gentlemen require comforts, and the ladies muffs.

AT a debating society a wheelwright was said to be the best orator.

WHY are ladies who ride in railway carriages reserved? Because they are afraid to ask a gent to put Tilt to you. It is because ladies' trains are always behind.

AN old gentleman recently had his servant of having stolen his stick. The man protested perfect innocence.

"Why," replied his master, "the stick could never have walked away."

"Certainly not, sir; unless it was a walking-stick."

"I say, my dear Miss Partington, "how do they find out the difference between the earth and the sun?"

"Oh," said the young hopeful, "they calculate a quarter of an inch, and then multiply by four."

AN itinerant preacher, who rambled in his sermon, was requested to stick to his text, replied, "that sentiment of would hit the most bricks."

"How is it," said one miss to another, "that John Peel never has a cold?"

"Because he's got a Roman nose, and feels safe, don't you see, for my cold that it has always been said that a Roman knows—no dodge."

A MAN who had brutally assaulted his wife was brought before Judge Cole, of Albany, July and had a good deal to say about "getting justice."

"Prisoner," said Judge Cole, "you can't have; the court has no power to hang you."

A FEW days since a fellow was tried for stealing a wood saw. He applied for the only book in the dock. The gentleman asked how far he had carried it, and the reply was two miles. That is quite enough, said the judge, and he was convicted, and committed the prisoner.

A NEGRO in Georgia, who was sold at Hill 1000 Bond, which is more some of his acquaintances, who had never seen such an idea of it said: "Why, what is the power of hearing with the eyes instead of the ears."

A MAN who counts a young woman in the starlight generally expects to get a win in a twinkling.

WHY are books our best friends? Because, when they're in, you can always shut them up without offence.

"I say, Pat," said a Yankee, "why don't you sue the railroad corporation for the damages you have received? I think your legs broken all to smash. Sue them for damages."

"Sue them, musha, eh, boy! I have had damages enough already—I see them for repairs."

WHAT is that which a man may have never possessed, and yet have behind him?—A will.

A STORY OF ABSORBING INTEREST.
LOVE AND PRIDE.
A NOVEL,
BY MRS. GREY.

"A story of more absorbing interest, characters drawn to the life. Mrs. Grey starting prudent and unimpeachable, has seldom, if ever, been presented in the works of novelists. One whole never of Augustus Hastings Brass is a marvel of clever impudence, as that of Sheridan Garvisi is of cool, fiendish villany, while the heroine's is a noble and beautiful portraiture. The plot is worked out with consummate skill, and every chapter increases the interest until the work ends in artistic and happy climax."—London Times.

SEVEN GREAT BLESSINGS SECURED TO THE HUMAN RACE,
BY ONE BOTTLE OF RADWAY'S
READY RELIEF.

1st.—If suddenly seized with pain or sickness, the use of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF will instantly relieve. DIAST EASE and it exterminates the threatened disease.

2d.—If suffering from any acute, inflammatory, rheumatic, glandular, nervous, bilious or other disease, RADWAY'S READY RELIEF will cure the patient, without occasioning loss of time, change of diet, or the use of other medicines.

3d.—If subject to Headache, Sour Taste in the Mouth, Dizziness, Sickness, or Sinking, Melancholy, Fits, Toothache, Loss of Appetite, General Debility, Costiveness, Indigestion, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Sore Throat, Coughs, Colds, Influenza, Diphtheria, Croup, Inflammation of the Kidneys, Ulceration, Kidneys or Bladder, Radway's Ready Relief will afford immediate ease, and quickly cure the complaint.

4th.—Renders the Strke.—If afflicted with Spinal difficulties or with Diseases, Incontinence of Urine, Irritation of the Bladder, Partial or Complete Paralysis or the Limbs, Sluggishness of the Kidneys, Leucorrhœa, Whites, Ulcer Alcus, Failing of the Womb, and other painful difficulties, Radway's Ready Relief rubbed the entire length of the spine for ten or twenty minutes, twice a day, will cure the worst case. Let those who have well authenticated cases where Radway's Ready Relief, when all other remedies have been employed, have contracted painful diseases, and those suffering from Rheumatism in any form, Neuralgia, Kidneys or Bladder, Radway's Ready Relief will afford immediate ease, and quickly cure the complaint.

5th.—Rendered the Strke.—Afflicted with Spinal difficulties or with Diseases, Incontinence of Urine, Irritation of the Bladder, Partial or Complete Paralysis or the Limbs, Sluggishness of the Kidneys, Leucorrhœa, Whites, Ulcer Alcus, Failing of the Womb, and other painful difficulties, Radway's Ready Relief rubbed the entire length of the spine for ten or twenty minutes, twice a day, will cure the worst case. Let those who have well authenticated cases where Radway's Ready Relief, when all other remedies have been employed, have contracted painful diseases, and those suffering from Rheumatism in any form, Neuralgia, Kidneys or Bladder, Radway's Ready Relief will afford immediate ease, and quickly cure the complaint.

6th.—Rendered the Strke.—Afflicted with Spinal difficulties or with Diseases, Incontinence of Urine, Irritation of the Bladder, Partial or Complete Paralysis or the Limbs, Sluggishness of the Kidneys, Leucorrhœa, Whites, Ulcer Alcus, Failing of the Womb, and other painful difficulties, Radway's Ready Relief rubbed the entire length of the spine for ten or twenty minutes, twice a day, will cure the worst case. Let those who have well authenticated cases where Radway's Ready Relief, when all other remedies have been employed, have contracted painful diseases, and those suffering from Rheumatism in any form, Neuralgia, Kidneys or Bladder, Radway's Ready Relief will afford immediate ease, and quickly cure the complaint.

7th.—If you are constantly threatened with any infectious disease—either Scarlatina, Yellow Fever, Typhus or Typhoid Fevers, Radway's Ready Relief is the best disinfectant in the world, and a sure preventive, to those who use it, against attacks of these maladies. In cases of the formation of the Bowels, Bilious Colic, Painters' Colic, or any active inflammatory disease, the Ready Relief will immediately afford ease and comfort. Rendered still more powerful in over all preparations of opium, morphine, veratrine, or other opiated narcotics. It rolls pains, by imparting strength and vigor to the system, and arousing the vital energies to a healthful action, instead of the prostration the perceptive faculties, and making them insensible to pain. Let those who would live and enjoy health use RADWAY'S READY RELIEF.

8th.—To all who are sick and in pain, use the RELIEF. It can do no harm, and will surely do good. Prevents the yellow fever, and is established a true specific of the Ready Relief in a wine-glass of water will in a few minutes cure the worst pain in the world. Keep your stomach clean and healthy, your breath sweet, your nerves strong, your spirits bright, your appetite good, and your digestion perfect, by occasionally taking at bed-time will insure calm and pleasant sleep.

The Remedy is truly a Family Medicine. It can be used by any one with perfect safety, and will in all cases where pain or uneasiness exists.

It is the cheapest medicine in the world. One fifty-cent bottle contains more medicine, as well as being a superior medicine, than one dollar's worth of extraordinary pain-killing stuff sold in the day.

One fifty-cent bottle of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF will do more good, and can be used for more purposes, than any other medicine in the world.

READ WHAT MRS. WESTCOTT SAYS.

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND OTHERS SAY THE SAME.

MRS. WESTCOTT,
AN EXPERIENCED NURSE OF WINCHESTER—READ WHAT SHE SAYS.

"Your Ready Relief and Regulating Pills do our family more good than all the physic and doctors we have had for the last twenty years. We always keep Radway's Ready Relief and one of the Pills—in our house and would not be without them. Radway's Ready Relief gives no ease and comfort; if threatened I use the Relief in large spoonfuls or teaspoonfuls. I use the Relief; it nourishes pains about about my body; I stop the pain with the Relief; if I catch cold I take the Relief; it tootheaches or corches, or hoarseness, I apply the Relief; in a few minutes the pain is gone. I would not be without it for any consideration, or otherwise than to keep it on hand; neither nausea nor pain, discolouration of the skin; if they burn or scald themselves, in Radway's Relief takes out the fire and relieves them enough. I could not sleep without a bottle of Radway's Ready Relief within my reach; so with the Pills, the very moment my stomach or bowels are out of order, one of Radway's Pills is all that I require to restore my system to order and regularity."

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold
Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received to it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who bare restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is stereotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

The Last Act of the Tragedy.

THE last act of the tragedy, beginning with the assassination of President Lincoln, on the 14th of April, and ending on the 7th of July, the execution of four of the criminals directly implicated, viz., Mrs. SURRATT, Powell (alias Payne), Harold and Atzerodt. Of the others arrested and tried, Dr. Mudd, Arnold and McLaughlin were sentenced to imprisonment for life, and Spangler to six years' imprisonment. The verdict of the court met the approval of the public judgment, and the country feels a real relief in the knowledge that it has been carried out. Men seek to draw a veil over an incident which is without parallel in our history, and which, while it crowns the ignominy and atrocity of the rebellion, of which it was a natural sequence and a part, is still felt to be an injurious reflection on the national character. It has gone into history, in which a future generation will assign to it its true place and position. That it will be found to have been a part of that widespread and desperate scheme of incendiarism and murder which was organized in Canada during the spring and summer of 1864, and in which the Chicago plot, the St. Albans raid, the firing of New York, and the introduction of the yellow fever were only incidents, there can be no doubt. And as these acts were known and approved by the Confederate government, if not originated by it, and as it furnished money and commissioned men "on detached service," for their execution, there is no exaggeration or credulity in believing that Jefferson Davis and his cabinet were parties to the assassination of the President. That assassination, and with it the murder of the Vice-President, the Lieutenant General, and the Secretaries of State and War, were logically, and almost necessarily, part of the great scheme of demoralizing and paralyzing the nation, already effshet before pestilence, fire, internal outbreak, and unexpected and successful invasion from a neutral soil. The gigantic villainy, conceived in Richmond, and organized in Canada, would have been incomplete, and its objects but half accomplished, unless the head and heart of the government in Washington received a deadly blow. That, and that alone, could give complete success to the elaborate combinations which were to divide and thus destroy the loyal north. The conspiracy, however failed in many of its parts. The attempted revolution in Chicago was thwarted by vigilant officers; the burning of New York failed through Providential interposition; the raid across the border was only a partial success; the yellow fever was a terrible scourge, but equally a failure. The deadly design on the members of the government came nearer success, but too late to serve any purpose but that of revenge.

The rebellion and its apologists can never rid themselves of the black blotch of assassination. It will be forever fixed upon them. The "damned spot" will "out" never.

The punishment of the criminals has followed close on their condemnation. This is as it should be. It has created the shock of horror that maudlin sentimentality which a part of our people are always ready to expend on behalf of any criminal, however guilty, has not given the President appeals and importunities to set against his judgment and defeat justice, and it has shown that justice is swift and certain. It has, moreover, dropped the veil from the past and shut the bolt of the prison between the nation and the constant contemplation of the participants in its most revolting crime known to history. We shall hear their names no more, and to be permitted to think of our dead President only as a great and good man and statesman, and of the assassins only under his name with the names of the wretches who have paid the penalty of their crimes with their worthless lives.

"The Republic of Washington."

AMONG the mass of rebel archives and documents which have fallen into the hands of the government, and which will illustrate the history of the rebellion, is the original minutes of the original rebel convention, held at Montgomery, Alabama. They were discovered in private hands in Georgia, and contain many interesting facts connected with the secession movement. The original draft of the so-called Confederate constitution was made by Mr. Memminger, who was chairman of the Committee on the Constitution, and subsequently Davis' Secretary of the Treasury. The parts copied from the constitution of the United States are in the form of slips cut from a printed copy of that instrument. As regards a name for the union of rebel states, it was at first proposed to call it "The United States of America," which came within one vote of being adopted, but finally, and after much discussion, the title of "The Confederate States of America" was decided on. It was the South Carolina delegation were hostile to the name of "Republic" in any connection. The preamble to the constitution was also changed with it. The first expression, "invoking the aid of Almighty God," did not get dovetailed in permanently until after much talk. The motion would be to amend by the words "invoking the aid of Almighty God, who is the God of the Bible, and the rightful source of all power and government, as taught in the Old and New Testament as a part of the Bible and thus admit the divinity of the Saviour, and this was shocking to Jew Benjamin, and it was finally voted down. The attempt was made to have a recognition of the Christian Sabbath, thus: "No man shall be compelled to do civil service on Sunday." But it was voted down. Subsequently, an attempt was made to have a recognition of the Sabbath engrafted on the law with reference to carrying and delivering the mails. A member from Louisiana moved as an amendment that, inasmuch as the people of Louisiana believed in permitting everybody to worship God on the days and in the ways preferred, therefore the state of Louisiana should be excepted from said provision. Texas desired the same exception, and in this way the motion was killed. An attempt was made, and nearly carried, prohibiting the admission of new states, unless these recognised slavery in their constitutions, and provided for its protection by law. The proposition, it seems, was voted down, simply as impolitic and likely to repel foreign sympathy. The same motive led the convention to prohibit the slave trade, but then it was declared that any states who might be engaged in, contrary to the prohibition, should be sold to the highest bidder. All the votes in this connection were taken by states, without regard to the number of delegates representing them.

We preserve these curious documents, giving so deep an insight into the history of the rebellion, will be published, if not for the instruction of mankind, as a warning to the disaffected. A strange episode in the annals of our country will be the story of this great rebellion, which we are now beginning to regard as a thing of the far past.

THE European press is full of advice to this country, the burthen of which is leniency and moderation. Our excellent and disinterested friends of London, mainly following the lead of the Times, are especially solicitous. The fervent parishioner, they tell us, that ought to be the model of a nation who plunged the country in war, should be political disability. By making the punishment of "the greatest of all crimes" consist only in future inability to deposit a ballot, we may be setting "a glorious example," but it is certain we would be committing a great and unnecessary error. We cannot with due regard to our future safety, afford to the world a spectacle so grossly indisposed to grant practical immunity to treason, and make the punishment of traitors nominal. Great Britain has had some experience in framing and setting the world a "glorious example" in this respect, which she has strangely neglected. It is little over twenty years since the Queen was an insurgent in Canada, which was forcibly put down. Does the London press remember what was done with the participants in that affair, who surrendered? Can it tell us how many were hung and how many banished? It was fully two years, we believe, after all was over before a general amnesty was granted. Do our kind monitors remember that there was a treasonable outbreak in India not long ago. We know no act of atrocity by which it was characterised, that has not its parallel in the rebellion in this country. The massacres of Cawnpore was not more bellish in the spirit which inspired it, than the scheme to burn down our cities, or destroy them by pestilence. How did the British authorities treat the "erring" Sepoys? Were they washed with rose water, and told to "go and sin no more?" Were they blown away from the cannon, or executed, as were the princes of Dahli —in such wise did Great Britain set the world an "example" of "mercy and clemency?" In a time she did not stoop to execute John Mitchel for his part in the Young Ireland and the Irish "Potato-garden Rebellion." But had that apostle of liberty used his pike more and his tongue less, had a dozen of the British soldiery by him and his followers, does any one suppose he would have escaped the gallows to save our self-wish his detested premier?

Strangely enough we are told to be magnanimous and merciful because of the magnitude of the rebellion. Because we have the hope of reconquerors, for four years, cost hundreds of thousands of lives and uncounted treasure; therefore those who incited and carried it on should be released from the punishment of treason. The reverse of this proposition is unfortunately in proportion! The statement of the proposition suffices to condemn it. Foreign concern for us should have no undue influence on the question of the disposition that is to be made of him and the Toombses and Wises, who were his principal agents. We do not permit murderers to doubt for an instant, that if convicted of treason he will be punished as a traitor. Certainly the United States is the greatest of nations, should not shield him from the punishment due "to the greatest of crimes."

RECTORISM everywhere speak as if it were a little disproportionate for them to find all the armed rebellion once over, everything done, and relapse into peace and amity. Do they suppose that a war of this kind could have been fought without a radical diffurance of social principle, and that that radical difference will disappear with the close? Do they suppose that the South would be—not mercy but criminal weakness, in the American government—to allow the future political life of the southern states to be moulded anew under the same influences which governed them before the war. To accept the test of loyalty to be right with a great principle is treason; and, after victory, to let the seeds of disloyalty remain in the soil, would be to invite a cynical contempt for the sacredness both of political duty and human life, simply indocile, if not criminal.

In a pretty country studio, seven miles from Fontainebleau, a great woman was at work on a colony day in June—dressed as French ladies, who wear their ankles, uncles, shoes, in a loose and petticoat. The swordsman was Millet, the Rembrant, and she was painting cattle and resting ground. Suddenly the door of her studio opened, and without announcement of any kind a charming woman entered the room, threw her arms around Mille. Rosa's neck, clasped a ribbon around it, from which depended a little cross well known in France. The visitor was the Empress Eugenia. Mille. Bonheur had never heard a word of this visit or of this decoration being intended for her; and she sat down on a low stool and enjoyed a good cry, while the empress chatted with her about her palettes, her pencils, and the delightful trifles of her art. Certes, the Empress Eugenia knows how to bestow a graceful act by the added grace of doing it well.

TREASON has stimulated all the other crimes in the decalogue. It has revealed human depravity in its most revolting aspects. To the ordinary horrors of a temporary war, rebellion has superadded piracy on the seas, and conspiracies to rob and murder non-combatants, bring pestilence among us, and kindle incendiary fires in our cities. And more and worse, it has atrociously outraged the usages of civilized warfare, by starving and poisoning Union prisoners by tens of thousands! And all this, in the common desire to reconstruct and restore the Union as it is, is being practically forgotten. We are not at all likely to visit crimes with sufficient punishment, either to vindicate the laws or to create wholesome precedents.

It is not surprising that the political structure, of which Jefferson Davis was the so-called president, should have meditated a "perpetual" strife game" which that arch traitor invented. Nor is it surprising that the state-sovereignty that "Confederacy" should have been imbued with a similar contempt for morality. Among the papers of Colonel B. Earth, the rebel Secretary of Tennessee, under whose malignant influence that state was forced into secession, there has been found a letter, directed by him to Enoch Thompson, Buchanan's Secretary of the Interior, and Davis's pureholder in Canada, dated Nashville, June 9, 1861, in which he says:

"The probability is that Tennessee will adopt the ordinance of secession. The convention will meet in the house of Northern constitute during the continuance of the session. The ordinance should be passed by a large majority at its meeting on the 17th inst., It will be proper to have the ordinance submitted to the people, under the fact that you are a citizen of the State of Mississippi, and not bona fide citizen."

THE Excel year closed on June 30th. The Treasury had a surplus, on that date, of $35,000,000 in gold and silver. Its annual payments, on account of interest on gold-bearing bonds, amount to about $30,000,000.

THE sales of the second and last series of "seven-thirties" have averaged over $12,000,000 per week since the loan was offered to the public, and the rate of interest is increasing. There are only $125,000,000 remaining to be disposed of, which, at the rates of last week ($15,000,000) will be taken up by the first of September. No further loan will be necessary.

A GRAND Hotel has been erected, at a cost of over $1,500,000, in Portland place, London, called the Langham Hotel. The Prince of Wales is among the proprietors. The general arrangements of the hotel is on the American plan, with this exception—that the guests dine together, and clean and comfortable bed. Every improvement suggested by our American hotel system, as well as by the Continental hotels, has been introduced. The building is perfectly fireproof; hits as an extra precaution against all sorts of risks, water is supplied throughout, and the hydrants will contain distributed throughout the building, that anything in the shape of a fire could be quenched in a minute. It is stated in the papers that the London hotel will accommodate 2,000 guests.

IN Newberne, N. C., there are 5,000 negroes who have incomes of from $200 to $1,000; 15 with incomes of from $1,000 to $2,000; 4 of from $2,000 to $3,000, and 1 over $3,000. We suppose the principles enunciated by our forefathers, and for which they fought, more were more conspicuous than with the unenlightened negroes who have a voice in levying them and in expending the proceeds—the go required to obey laws should be fairly represented by the bodies which make or modify those laws. We are now called on to apply these principles, and shall studify ourselves and bring contempt on our class if we fail to do so justly.

REV. PETTIGREW V. NASH, "Lull Pastor to the Church of the Holy Communion," has received his circulars to the "Peace Dimocrisy." He informs them that "Peace on earth we won't do no good, for before the next election the last war you ever will be disavowed that the war was a failure, and that the South is gone in some parts as Pennsylvany and sullens flimsy for sum time yet; but that can't be depended on."

SENATOR SUMNER has received from colored citizens of Georgia a petition in the following words, with the request that he would present it to President Johnson:

To his Excellency Andrew Johnson, President of the United States:

SIR—We, the undersigned, colored citizens of the state of Georgia, respectfully represent that we are loyal, always have been loyal, and always will remain loyal to the United States government, and desire to take service of the government, we humbly petition to be allowed to examine the rebel archives.

There are upwards of 300 signatures. GEN. SICKLES, who forwards the petition, writes that "every signature is genuine."

THE captured personal correspondence of Jefferson Davis affords materials for many a paragraph and epigram. Among other things, Mrs. Davis, in a letter to her husband, dated March, 1863, at Montgomery, gives an odd glimpse at an incident commonplace enough in a slaveholding communifty, and reproves herself very naively for a bit of inconsistent humanity:

"The poor girl I thought of buying appealed to me as the wife of the president to take her out of the tavern, and, looking so weary, said, 'I am so tired of being bought by first one negro-trader and then another. If you have a little girl, as they say you have, I will wait upon her till I die if she will only be good to me.' It was an extravagant kind of sympathy, which I felt self-reproved for afterwards, though upon inquiry her character proved unexceptionable."

A DAILY Copperhead journal, always careful of the fame of the rebel, repudiating Mississippian, gives three reasons why the "petticoat story" should be regarded as a fiction: 1st. Improbable on its face, it is destitute of proof; 2d. It has become stale as a joke; 3d. There would be nothing very discreditable to Davis in it if it were true.

A MOTHER in Ohio had a son with Sherman in his march via Atlanta, Savannah, Columbia, etc., to Washington. His correspondence with her was as follows:

"ATLANTA,

"Dear Mother:—Bully boy all right.

"BOB."

"SAVANNAH,

"Dear Mother:—Bully boy got a hole in his hide—not bad,

"BOB."

"COLUMBUS, —.

"Dear Mother:—Bully boy home to-morrow.

"BOB."

When asked by a friend, to whom the infrequency and brevity of his epistles home had been mentioned, why he did not write oftener and at greater length, answered:

"Bully boy's got his haversack full. Keep it all to tell by word of mouth. Won't he have a good time talking up the old today?"

THE city of New York has furnished during the war just closed 116,382 soldiers. Of these 37,730 received bounties. The cost, to the city and county, of raising these men, was $17,512,000. The number of years of service represented by the contingent of the city was 261,000 years. As all the men accepted were able-bodied men, and counting their earnings at the low rate of one dollar per day, the value of their labor lost to the city, excluding Sundays and holidays, would be upwards of $78,000,000, which, with the amount directly contributed, would make nearly $100,000,000 as the amount contributed by the city, irrespective of private contributions, and the vast sums paid in taxes. In one way and another, the city of New York has contributed not less than $400,000,000 to the support of the war.

A GENTLEMAN connected with the Confederate government, and who accompanied Jeff. Davis in his flight from Richmond, has published a full and vivid account of the incidents of that famous hegira. He tells us of the alternate hopes and fears that beset the party, how its members fell off as the dangers clustered around it, of the coldness of the people, and the insubordination of the soldiery, who defied the authority of the rebel president and treated his person with contumely, and finally how Davis, abandoned by Breckinridge, by Mallory and Benjamin, finally sought the camp of his wife, who was in danger of attack and robbery from the rebel soldiers themselves, who believed that some portions of the Richmond treasures were in her charge. A little guard, it seems, remained with her for her personal protection. Although the narrator does not appear to have been present at the capture of the president, his relation of the circumstance has a vraisemblance which will probably ensure its acceptance as authentic.

"When the musketry firing was heard in the morning, at dim gray dawn, it was supposed to be between the rebel marauders and Mrs. Davis' few camp defenders. Upon this impression Davis hurriedly put on his boots and prepared to go out for the purpose of interposing, saying:

"'They will at least as yet respect me.'

"As he got to the tent door thus hastily equipped, and with this good intention of preventing an effusion of blood by an appeal in the name of a fading but not wholly faded authority, he saw a few cavalry ride up the road and deploy in front.

"'Ha, Federals!' was his exclamation.

"'Then you are captured,' cried Mrs. Davis, with emotion.

"In a moment she caught an idea—a woman's idea—and as quickly as women in an emergency execute their designs, it was done. He slept in a wrapper—a loose one. It was yet around him. This she fastened, ere he was aware of it, and then, bidding him adieu, urged him to go to the spring, a short distance off, where his horses and arms were. Strange as it may seem, there was not even a pistol in the tent. Davis felt that his only course was to reach his horse and arms, and complied. As he was leaving the door, followed by a servant with a water bucket, Miss Howell flung a shawl over his head! There was no time to remove it without exposure and embarrassment, and, as he had not far to go, he ran the chance exactly as it was devised for him. In these two articles consisted the woman's attire of which so much nonsense has been spoken and written, and under these circumstances and in this way was Jefferson Davis going forth to perfect his escape. No bonnet, no gown, no petticoats, no crinoline, nothing of all these. And what there was happened to be excusable under ordinary circumstances, and perfectly natural as things were.

"But it was too late for any effort to reach his horses, and the Confederate president was at last a prisoner in the hands of the United States."

TOWN GOSSIP.

IF it were not so trite a remark, we should feel inclined to say, "that there has been nothing moving except stagnation" since the thermometer has been over 90 in the ice box, which is about the temperature of the equinoctial of Quibos," so learnedly referred to by Shakespeare in his Twelfth Night. But really when the weather is more adapted for cucumbers than man, it requires a considerable approximation to the vegetable nature, to preserve one's equanimity of mind in days like those we have just had. To be sure a thankful man might say, that as the cucumber was ripened for man the weather thus directly made for the one was indirectly made for the other, since he received the benefit of the growth. Our readers will understand the pleasure we derive from rolling among a Barmecide feasts of ice creams, cucumbers, lobster salads, cooled clarets, ice water, and every other description of frozen condiments.

With regard to the places of public amusement now open we shall be very brief, for the simple reason that the seaside has more attractions for all. Niblo's has gone into the Irish drama, and Barnum has commenced his usual summer season of pantomime, which after all is the proper dramatic entertainment for equatorial weather. For strange to say the renowned Fox, Tony Denier, and his admirable troupe, spring about so coolly that it is really refreshing to look at them. Since Francois and Gabriel Ravel we have had no funnier pantomimist than Denier, whose powers of grimace beat Gutta Percha, India Rubber, or a politician's conscience out of the field. Next to pantomimes we admire the whales the most, and refer to another part of our paper for "portraits of these interesting twins."

Now that the Central Park has become a fixed institution, it seems wonderful to us that we ever existed without that most natural and indispensable luxury. What did our aristocracy do for their drives? and where did all the tea-table tabbies of Fifth avenoodledom pick up their gossip? As for the music in the open air, the graceful swans, the quiet walks, and all the moving panorama of life, seen in its heaviest, deepest, and yet most frivolous pulse, every Saturday afternoon, we question if Hyde Park can offer a more splendid sight than is presented now in our Central Park. It has, also, the additional interest of being a complete contrast. As our cousins on the other side of the Atlantic trot out their aristocracy as the oldest in the world, we exhibit ours as the youngest. There is more repose in the one, but there is infinitely more glitter in the other. Both have their peculiar excellencies; one represents national solemnity, the other national energy and restlessness—— But we must drop our parallel, or it would never end, the aristocracy of old and new Anglo-Saxondom being so provocative of antagonistic comment.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—It is said that the project of purchasing Ford's Theatre by the Loyal Leaguers, for the purpose of converting it into a Literary Institution, has fallen through, and that it will be soon re-opened as a theatre.

—— The illustrious Admiral Dupont, United States Navy, whose unexpected death is so deeply mourned by the government and the country, bequeathed in his will the sum of $175,000 to the great asylum for the education and relief of the orphan children of the sailors and soldiers of the republic, soon to be organized at Washington by an act of Congress. That is the amount of Admiral Dupont's prize-money during his brilliant services on the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron; although he died possessed of a handsome fortune of his own, the merit of this noble deed is equally conspicuous.

—— A farmer states that the milk venders only pay them five cents a quart for pure milk, for which they charge 10 cents, when diluted with 50 per cent. of water and salt.

—— The German Connecticut Staat's Zeitung has, at the close of an editorial about the Fourth of July, the following words, literally translated: "Celebrate the Fourth of July, and remember thereby George Washington, because he was a conqueror; but remember also another great statesman riveted in chains, cast in a dungeon, and this is Jeff. Davis, the martyr of State Rights."

—— North Carolina, and even that mother of rebellion, South Carolina, are anxious to encourage Northern emigration, while Virginia does all she can to prevent it, the legislature of that state having refused to incorporate a company which had been formed to buy and sell unemployed lands for the furtherance of immigration from the North, although the Governor had recommended the measure in strong terms. The enlightened legislators of the Old Dominion opposed the bill on the broad ground that it was not desirable to encourage Yankees to come among them.

—— The United States Telegraph Company has determined to construct a new line of telegraph, connecting Washington and the Southern cities. Mr. J. R. Dowell has been appointed Superintendent of this line, and is energetically pushing forward the preparations for its construction.

—— Gov. Fenton has commuted the punishment of death, to which Walters was sentenced for the murder of his mistress, to imprisonment for life.

—— The Houston (Texas) correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune says positively that Gen. Shelby, with a body of 12,000 Missourians and Texans are on their way to join the army of Maximilian in Mexico.

—— There were two firemen's riots on the evening of the 6th inst. in the neighborhood of Church and Greenwich streets. Engineer Decker tried in vain to quell the riot, which, however, yielded to the police. An attempt was made to burn a house with phosphorus.

—— Gov. Fletcher, of Missouri, has issued his proclamation announcing the adoption of the new constitution for that state at the election held on the 6th of June. The total number of votes cast was 85,478, of which 43,670 were in favor of the constitution and 41,808 against it, the majority by which it was adopted being thus 1,862. It went into operation on the 4th inst.

—— A Mrs. Adelia Ridey one night last week entered a restaurant on Third street, near Girard avenue, Philadelphia, and, without apparent provocation, drew a dagger and instantly stabbed one of the proprietors, named Joseph Sides, and his brother, Isaac Sides, who rushed to Joseph's assistance. Both the men died soon after. The woman fled and concealed herself, but was subsequently arrested and committed for trial.

—— The London correspondent of the New York daily Tribune gives a graphic sketch of John Mitchell, Jr., (son of the Irish patriot) who was killed in the rebel service at Fort Sumter. It appears that the correspondent met him in Charleston in 1860, when he boasted of having assisted to murder, by lynching, an abolitionist!

—— On Sunday, the 2d inst., Capts. Thorne, Jourden and Jameson, of the Fourth, Sixth and Seventh Police Precincts, enforced the statute requiring tradesmen to close their shops on one day in seven. Those Israelites in Chatham street who did not observe the Jewish Sabbath, were consequently required to close their doors on the Christian Sabbath.

—— Of the State elections which are yet to be held before the close of the year, that of Kentucky excites more than ordinary interest. The election turns on a single issue—ratification or non-ratification of the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery. When the late legislature for the last time took a vote on ratification in the House of Deputies, 44 voted in favor, and 46 against.

—— The wheat harvest in Southern Illinois and Indiana is finished. Our exchanges from that section speak of the yield as enormous, and the quality as unsurpassed by the crop of any previous year. To add to the satisfaction of the farmers, the weather has been as favorable as they could desire, and the new crop has been harvested in the very best condition.

—— The Legislature of Rhode Island has adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the General Assembly and people of the State, that in the reconstruction of the governments of the States lately in rebellion against the government and authority of the United States, the usual power and legal authority vested in the Federal Government should be executed to secure equal rights, without respect to color, to all citizens residing in those States, including therein the right of the elective franchise.

—— The guerrilla Champ Ferguson, now in jail at Nashville, boasts of having committed 100 murders.

—— Nearly 150 pardons have been granted in the last week. Over 100 of them were North Carolinans.

—— A few nights ago some 20 married ladies belonging to Easimanville, armed themselves with switches, and proceeding to the house of Mr. Amos Taylor, invaded his bedroom, and commenced a severe castigation. The cause for this "playful outrage," as a local paper calls it, was his having separated from his wife. He has had the "fair vixens" arrested, and their trial will soon come off.

—— The Fourth was celebrated in New Orleans, Gen. Banks presiding. He spoke in favor of negro suffrage and equal rights. A Freedmen's torchlight procession wound up the affair.

—— During the war, while in command at Savannah Beauregard passed many of his leisure hours with a family, a member of which reports that after delivering himself of his usual venomous speeches about the Yankees and Abolitionists, he concluded thus: "When I reach Massachusetts my first act shall be to blow Plymouth Rock out of existence; that will be the greatest and happiest moment of my life."

—— Mrs. Jefferson Davis is living in the Pulaski House, Savannah. Her little son seems to be enjoying himself hugely, and frequently amuses himself by singing in the hall, "We'll hang Jeff. Davis on a sour apple tree."

—— The prospect for the California wine crop of 1865 is good. The yield will be larger than ever before, unless some extraordinary misfortune should befall the grapes. About 2,000,000 of vines are now in bearing condition.

—— Gen. Butler has presented $5,000 to Phillips Academy, Andover, to provide a free scholarship, 50 years, for the son of a soldier—white or black—disabled in the war.

—— Private dispatches received at Milwaukee lately, announce the death, at Salt Lake City, of Gov. James D. Doty, of heart disease. Gov. Doty was a prominent man in the early history of Wisconsin, having been governor, delegated to Congress, and occupied many other important positions.

—— The population of Lawrence, Mass., is 21,699; in 1866 it was 17,639. The males number 8,929; females, 12,772.

—— The Jewish Record understands that a joint stock company has been formed to start a large hotel in Broadway, N. Y., in the neighborhood of 30th street, where the cuisine is to be strictly Jewish.

—— A private letter has been received from Louis Kossuth, in which the great Hungarian orator and statesman expresses the greatest pleasure at the eradication of slavery from our country, and anticipates a glorious future for our now really free republic.

—— The Potomac Army, at one time composed of seven corps and 300,000 men, is to be reduced to three divisions, or 16,000 men.

—— Our ladies will hardly believe that a large number of their fine hats and bonnets are trimmed by males, but such is the fact. In one of the largest fashionable millinery stores in Newburyport, Mass., a man is regularly employed to make and trim bonnets.

—— The Manchester (N. H.) Mirror says that there never was so great demand for female operatives skilled in the business of working in cotton mills as now. The Amoskeag and Stark Mills would start up double the present amount of work if they had plenty of weavers and other skilled help, and all the other mills are short of the same class of labor.

—— The 15th annual commencement of St. Francis Xavier college took place on the 5th of July, with the usual ceremonies. Archbishop McClosky presided. There was a very numerous audience. The music and exercises were of a very high order, especially Mr. Nevin's discourse on the teachings of philosophy.

—— The New Orleans Picayune announces the arrival of General Braxton Bragg. It says: "Like all the generals of the Confederate army, he recognizes the march of events, and is only ambitious now to retire, as before the war, and fulfil the duties of an American citizen."

—— The bills consequent upon the death of Mr. Lincoln, including those for decorating public buildings and those for the funeral, have all been delivered to Secretary Harlan. Their aggregate is but a trifle over $25,000, while the expense of President Harrison's funeral, when the display of mourning was much less general, and the ceremonies much less imposing, was $30,000.

Obituary.—Abraham Day, a revolutionary pensioner, 110 years of age, died at Cornish, Maine, June 14.

—— Madame Kossuth, the wife of the famous Hungarian leader, has died at Genoa, after a ten years' illness.

—— Mrs. Livingstone, the aged mother of Dr. Livingstone, the African traveler, died in Scotland on the 18th of June.

—— Mrs. Arbuthnot, fourth daughter of Lord Rivers, and niece of Earl Granville, President of the British Privy Council, has been killed by lightning, in Switzerland, under a most melancholy circumstance. She was spending her honeymoon with her newly-married husband among the Alps. Mrs. Arbuthnot, feeling a little tired, sat down, and Mr. Arbuthnot and the guide proceeded further, but never went out of sight or hearing of their companion. In a few minutes a furious thunderstorm burst over them, and they returned rapidly to the spot where they had left Mrs. Arbuthnot. She had been struck by lightning, and killed instantaneously.

Foreign.—John Stuart Mill, the famous logician and author, is opposed by the Tories of Westminster, England, in his election for that city as Member of Parliament, on the ground that he is an atheist.

—— Lord Brougham has denied that at any time he sympathised with the Southern confederacy, its advocacy of slavery rendering such an act on his part quite impossible.

—— In consequence of Prince Jerome Napoleon having resigned his position as President of the Grand International fair for 1866, it will be assumed by the Prince Imperial.

—— Maximilian has dealt a very heavy blow at the Mexican priesthood. He has declared state education to be universal and compulsory. This is most remarkable and advanced ground to be taken by an Austrian prince.

—— The wiseacre who writes letters from New York to the London Times draws a terrible picture of the state of our republic. The fires at Mobile, Nashville and Chattanooga, he declares as part and parcel of a plan to destroy us, and then, by way of a climax, in the true spirit of bathos, he adds, "Expulsion and beating of negroes for attempting to ride in the street cars are of daily occurrence in New York and Philadelphia."

—— Dr. Gasparin, at Naples, has found his eighth planet, which he calls "Beatrice," in honor of Dante. Its brilliancy is only equal to a star of the twelfth magnitude.

—— At the British Museum about 4,150 volumes are used in the reading-room daily; the number of readers has been about 106,000, or 360 per diem; 38,842 volumes have been added to the library during the past year, of which 2,730 were presented, 28,426 were purchased, and 7,686 acquired by copyright; 819 maps, charts and plans, have been added, in 3,326 sheets, and 44 atlases complete; 2,378 pieces of music have been obtained. The total number of articles received by this department has been 72,214, of which 1,283 were received under the international copyright treaties; 300,000 stamps have been impressed on these articles.

—— Black hair for ladies is now out of fashion in Paris, and red hair is in fashion; therefore, La Mode Illustrée well says that this is the hour of vengeance for women with red hair, who have so long been considered "the disinherited children of nature." It is their turn to be triumphant, and to watch dark-haired women imploring the chemist to take the black out of their locks, and to make them like their once-despised sisters.

—— M. Plon, the publisher of the "Life of Cæsar," printed 140,000 copies of the first edition. He has not yet got rid of more than 22,000, and complains bitterly.

—— A new infringement of the liberties of Frenchmen is announced in a Rouen paper. Hereafter no one is to get himself photographed without depositing a stamped (timbre) copy of his likeness in some official depository.

—— The whole length of the Atlantic cable was on board the Great Eastern, and the telegraphic fleet was expected to sail on the 10th of July for Valentia Bay. The tariff of charges for telegraphing is issued. The terms are: To England, 20 words or less, $100 in gold; for each additional word, $5. To the Continent, 20 words, $105; each additional word, $5 25. To Asia or Africa, 20 words, $125; each additional word, $6 25.

—— In a census of persons killed in the thoroughfares of London, it has been ascertained that the probable amount annually is some 252 persons.

—— The fact that the last baby of the Princess of Wales is to be called after its grandpa, is thus elegantly announced in the Court Journal: "There is just a faint rumor that the infant prince will receive the name of Christian, after the royal Dane, his grandfather." Queen Victoria has now eight grandchildren, six of whom are boys.

—— A discovery, made by a smith at Versailles, is much talked about among horse-dealers; it is a composition almost as hard as iron, which can be applied under the hoof without causing the animal the slightest pain, and cost 75 per cent. less than ordinary horse-shoes.

—— Pierre Soulé, ex-Frenchman, ex-rebel, ex-prisoner, ex-minister to Spain, has finally turned up in Mexico city, as a counsellor at law.

—— Strikes are becoming very common in Paris. The hack-drivers recently struck, and compelled all the lazy people of that gay capital to walk, to their intense disgust.

—— Additional fortifications are to be erected at Quebec. At Point Levi four forts, each to hold 3,000 men, are to be built.

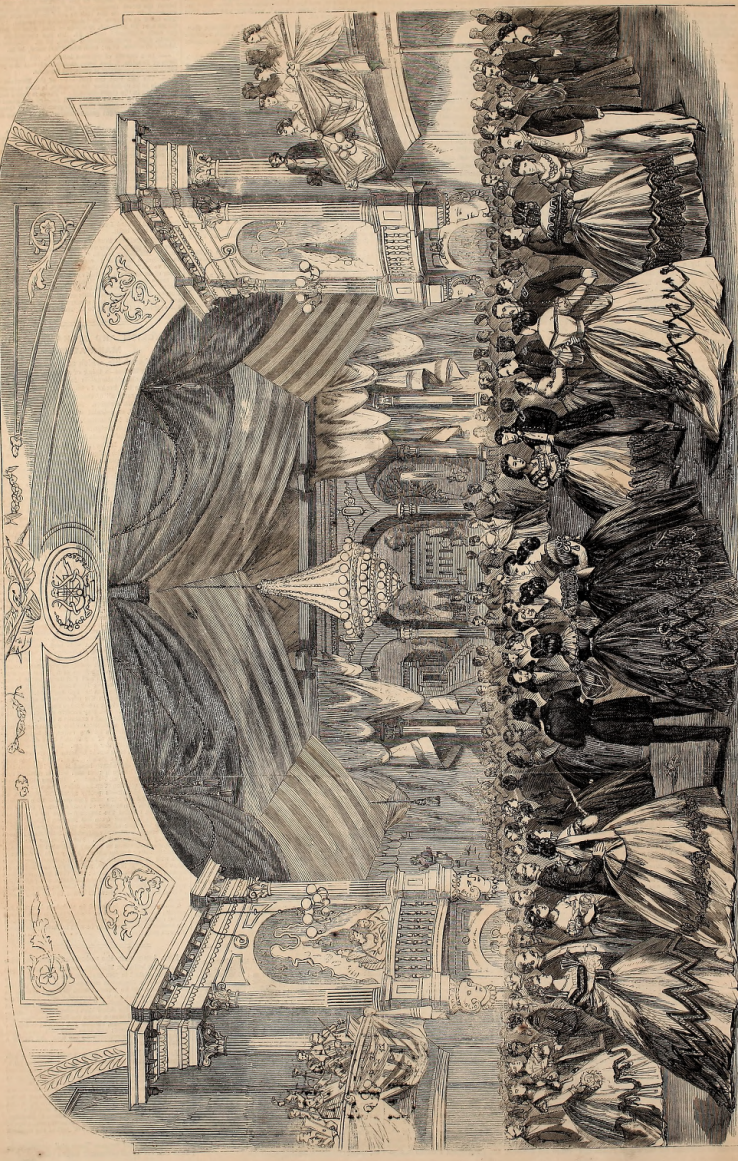
—— The eminent French author Michélet, is about to offer to the public a new work called the "Bible of Mankind." His theory is that "Mankind deposits his soul in a common Bible, and every great nation inscribes in it its verse." He views the received Bible as a narrow work of an ignorant, exclusive and egotistical race, and to make his "Bible of Mankind," gathers from the sacred and philosophical books of all nations. Greek, Roman, Indian, German, Celtic and African philosophers are all represented in this strange volume, which is, in the opinion of its author, to supersede the Holy Bible.

ENGLISH AND MOHAMMEDAN MARRIAGES.

THAT harem life, which so many of us fancy to be wholly lawless—a thing of eunuchs, poison, bowstrings and abominations—is found, on opening the Mohammedan law books, to be controlled by a host of regulations, nearly all of them contrived for the protection of woman's rights. Some of us dream that a harem is a jail, an oriental wife a slave. A little acquaintance with Mohammedan law would cause the sticklers for woman's rights to open their eyes rather wide. Is the British female better off than her sister of Egypt or Bengal? Is she more tenderly considered by the legislator and the judge? Has she more freedom to dispose of herself, and of her property?

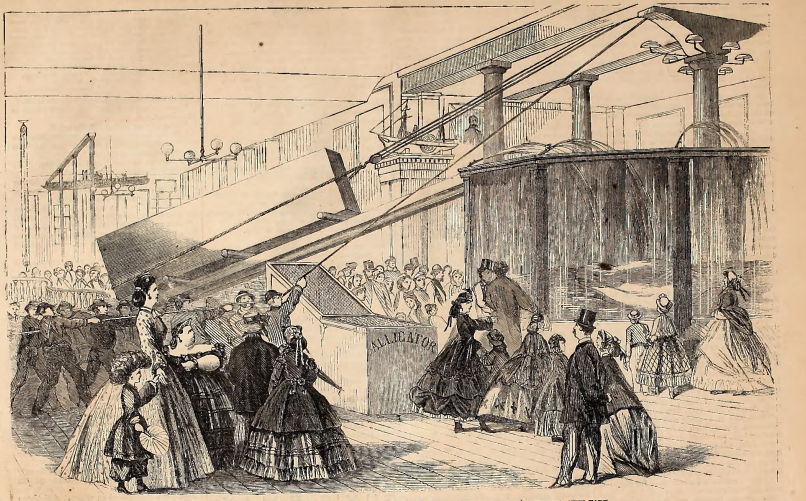
In one short chapter of a dozen pages Blackstone expounds the legal relations of an English husband and an English wife; while in the Hidayah, which may be loosely described as the Moslem Blackstone, the chapters on the home relations of an oriental husband and wife are long enough to fill a large volume. The English code may be briefly, and not untruly, said to explain that, unless a woman be specially protected by legal settlement, marriage makes her a slave—in some respects worse than a slave, since it extinguishes all her individual rights, and transfers her person and her property to the man she weds, to abuse and squander as may seem good in his eyes; and it does all this so thoroughly, that even should the ill-used lady procure a divorce from her brutal husband, on account of cruelty, desertion and adultery combined, she might have to retire, a cripple and a pauper, from a house to which she had come youthful, beautiful and rich. Nothing of this kind could occur in a Mussulman country. All the domestic relations—marriage, fosterage, repudiation, slavery, parentage and maintenance—are, in Islam, governed by rules of law.

Just as in England since William IV., a Moslem marriage is a civil affair only; requiring no mollah and no religious rite; a contract which may be dissolved by a civil process. It is a free partnership, for mutual comfort and enjoyment between man and woman. But, unlike the English ceremony, it confers no right on the man over the woman's property. The Mohammedan lady retains her separate individuality in her married state. She is not placed in the position of a femme couverte; but remains an independent and responsible being, with the same power of receiving and disposing of property which she enjoyed in her spinsterhood. She may sue and be sued without the concurrence of her husband, and without having recourse to the English fiction of a nearest friend. She may receive a pension. She can sign a bond. She might execute a trust.



It is true that, in a Mohammedan country, a woman may be divorced for a trifling cause, perhaps for no cause beyond the whim of a husband tired of her temper or satiated with her charms. Yet divorce is less common in Islam than would be imagined from the ease with which it may be effected. The record is not kept with any care, but we have heard it said in Cairo that final separation between man and wife is rarer in that city than in Berlin and London. Human nature—according to the opinion of an English widow who married a Bedaween sheikh—is pretty much the same in all countries; and few men care to separate from the love of their youth, the mother of their children, unless for such crimes against the marriage-bond as would part the English husband from his English wife. But besides the bulwark of early love and acquired habits, a Moslem lady is protected against her husband's caprice by a very formidable bond. Few orientals can afford to divorce their wives under any attainable difference of temperament or temperature. Every wife is dowered. On a wife being repudiated by her husband, her dower must be paid. It is always, relatively to the husband's means, a considerable sum; and thus polygamy and divorce, though the law permits them, are practically confined to those richer classes who, in every country of East and West, contrive to evade the stricter moral rules.

The husband, too, is bound to maintain his wife according to her rank; and so sternly is this part of the bridal compact enforced against a careless husband, that the husband, if a slave, may be sold for money on which the wife may live.

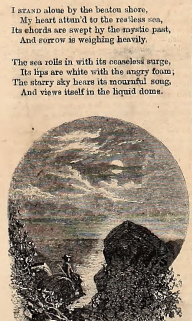


BILL ANDERSON, the notorious guerrilla, who was recently killed in Missouri, was accustomed to put those who wished to join his band to a severe test. On one occasion, a desperado went to him to join. Anderson told him that he "didn't want to have anything to do with him—that he was a coward," etc. The fellow replied: "Try me, captain." Anderson told him, "It was no use;" but the fellow kept insisting, until Anderson at last spat in his face, when the fellow knocked him down. Anderson arose, rubbed his temple, and said: "Swear him in, boys; any man that will knock Bill Anderson down, surrounded by his men, will do for a member of our band."

FARMER'S PAINT.—Farmers will find the following profitable for house or fence paint—Skim milk, two quarts; fresh-slacked lime, eight ounces; linseed oil, six ounces; white Burgundy pitch, two ounces; Spanish white, three pounds. The lime is to be slacked in water, exposed to the air, and then mixed with one-fourth milk; the oil, in which the pitch is dissolved, to be added, a little at a time; then the rest of the milk, and afterwards the Spanish white. This was sufficient for twenty-seven yards, two coats. This is for a white paint. If desirable, any other color may be produced; thus, if a cream color is desired, in place of part of the Spanish white, use the ochre alone.

MANY men and women have sad occasion to know that two do not necessarily make a pair.

THE GRAND BALL AT THE UNION HOTEL OPERA HOUSE, SARATOGA, N. Y., JULY 4.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. ALFRED BERGHAUS.



WHITE WHALES CAPTURED OFF THE COAST OF LABRADOR, NOW ON EXHIBITION AT BARNUM'S MUSEUM, NEW YORK.

BY THE SEA.

BY G. MIDDLEBROOK.

I STAND alone by the beaten shore,
My heart attun'd to the restless sea,
Its chords are swept by the mystic past,
And sorrow is weighing heavily.

The sea rolls in with its ceaseless surge,
Its lips are white with the angry foam;
The starry sky hears its mournful song,
And views itself in the liquid dome.

The crescent moon, thro' the ether waves,
In delving its way—a golden bark—
And far beneath on the deep afloat,
Its twin in beauty illumes the dark.

The years impell'd by the hand of time,
Return to-night—as an echo'd bell—
And sadly sweet on this starry eve,
The past rolls in with the ocean swell.

No voice of friend breaks the mystic air—
No dulcet song wings the tuneful sea—
No weary laugh cheers the solemn hour;
Ah! these will never come back to me.

The winged winds in their airy flight,
With "immortelles" sow'd this rugged spot;
And round these rocks and dewy nooks,
Shall ever bloom the "forget-me-not."

I stand alone by the beaten shore,
My heart attun'd to the restless sea,
Its chords are swept by the mystic past,
And sorrow is weighing heavily.

Jerome Fenwick's Cure.

BY LUCY A. RANDALL.

"DON'T go out to-night, Jerome—stay with me! Oh, Jerome! it is so lonely when you are away!"

The little kitchen had been swept and scoured until every board glistened like polished ivory—the red morocen curtains were drawn over the tiny-paned windows, and the great chesnut logs in the fire-place were singing and simmering and bursting into scarlet sheets of flame, with capricious alternations. There was no costly fresco on the walls—merely a cheap paper where gigantic pink roses burst into unaccountable bloom among the green tendrils of a stiff pea-vine; but the wooden clock was framed in the coral berries of the bittersweet and a little Christmas cross of hemlock sprigs and black ivy, yet hung between the windows, while Ross Fenwick's monthly roses and scented geraniums teased their delicate blossoms among the red peppers and bunches of penny-royal and catnip on the smoke-browned mantel above the chimney.

For Ross, our heroine, was nothing more dignified than a farmer's wife. Ay, but a farmer's wife, in this, our Empire state, is, it must be remembered, queen consort to a member of the popular sovereignty—and Ross was as fit to wear the royal robes, as any princess of the blood. She was quite tall, with pale brown hair, and eyes of the clear vivid blue that put you in mind of sunshine after rain, while the delicate color on her cheek fairly rivaled the monthly roses above. Her dress was very plain and simple—a dark brown calico, ruffled at the wrists, and relieved by a narrow linen collar, with a tiny black silk apron tied trimly around her graceful waist.

Jerome Fenwick, a tall, stalwart young fellow of some seven or eight and twenty, bit his lip, as Ross still kept urging:

"Stay with me this evening—only this once!"

"Nonsense, Ross; how ridiculous you are! A man can't stay at home for ever."

"But you were out last night and the night before!"

"Well, what then? Now, my love, don't you see how very absurd it is to expect me to be always dancing at your apron strings! I tell you I'm only going down to the Columbian, to look at the papers and talk over the news!"

"To the Columbian!" echoed Aunt Tryphosa Fenwick, suddenly appearing out of the sub-terranean depths of a trap-door, very much as a ghost upon the stage, only that she bore a pan of glossy red apples in one hand and brandished a formidable knife in the other. "Ah-h-h! you're going to the Columbian, be ye, Jerome Fenwick?"

"Yes, I am—and what then?" returned the young man, a spice of sullen defiance beginning to mingle with the playful tone he had assumed towards his wife.

"And I s'pose you're comin' back stupider nor a fool, as you come last night—or perhaps you're comin' with Peter Stryker at your head and Sam Garney at your heels, as you come last week; pretty doin's these, for a feller that hain't been married a year yet!"

"Dear Jerome," pleaded Ross, looking up

ROSA VISITS THE COLUMBIAN.

through sparkling tears, "please do not go out to-night."

"What d'ye s'pose you're coming to," went on Aunt Tryphosa, digging away at the apples as spitefully as if every one had been a modern Mawsyas, and she a spectacled Apollo; "I'm sayin' you've forgot how Pardon Pilkingham froze to death, a year ago come February, down by the hemlock holler, with the snow two feet deep on the ground. He'd been to the Columbian too! He'd read the papers and talked over the news! And maybe you don't remember how Josiah Hopkins went off in delirious tremens last June, all along of that same Columbian. He hadn't no pretty young wife at home to cry her eyes out arter his good-for-nothin' bones, though Josiah Hopkins hadn't! Oh!" ejaculated Aunt Tryphosa, emphatically, "I wish there was a Maine law. I just do! Better stay at home, Jerome Fenwick, afore had comse to worse!"

Jerome Fenwick's brow flushed an angry crimson.

"GOOD LAND 'O GOSHEN! IF I WAS ROSA, I'D GO DOWN TO THE COLUMBIAN TOO."

"I shall do precisely as I please, Aunt Tryphosa. Where's my hat?"

"Takin' for myself I'm a speakin'," went on the wrathful old lady, suspending her knife in mid air, "though you be my brother's son, it's for Rosa I Do you 'spose she hain't got no feelins when you come home night after night, as intoxicated as a fool? Good land o' Goshen! if I was Rosa, I'd go down to the Columbian too, and drink 'long with you. She won't get jes as good a right to a fool as you have! How'd you like that, Jerome Fenwick?"

He went out, giving the unconscious door a bang that made the cat start in her cosy corner of the red brick hearth, and brought a fresh torrent of rage to Miss Tryphosa's lips.

"Oh, Aunt Tryphosa," she sobbed, hiding her flushed face among the spikes in the good spinster's lap, "what shall we do? He is being ruined —and I—I have no power to hold him back."

"Barre him right in an obstinate fool!" muttered the irate old lady. Yet even while the words were on her lips, the bony fingers caressed Rosa's hair with strangely living touch.

"For your sake, Rosa! I'm vexed, for your sake, my pretty one!"

"If I had but been—yet he was so different in the days when we used to take those twilight walks, the days before we were married. My husband a drunkard! Oh, Aunt Tryphosa, I'd would sooner we were both in our graves!"

"Don't talk so, pet," murmured Aunt Tryphosa, shaking her head ominously. The Lord knows what's best for us all, but——"

"Hush!" exclaimed Rosa, springing to her feet, "I hear the gate click! Aunt Tryphosa, he has thought better of it! he has come back!"

No; bright, fair, almost girlish-looking young fellow in the lieutenant's uniform was not Jerome Fenwick—and there was a touch of bitterness even in the welcoming tears that Rosa poured out on the breast of the soldier-brother she had not seen for three long years.

"Hallo!" exclaimed Charley Warner. "Why, I thought you were so happy, Rosa. And where's my new brother-in-law?"

"He—he isn't at home," sobbed out Rosa. "Oh, Charley, I am very, very miserable!"

"Well, this is a queer welcome!" quoth the lieutenant, sitting down in front of the blazing chestnut logs, and drawing Rosa upon his knee, "now pray, tell me all about it, and comfort me, hold my hands tight, for I feel very much like giving my unknown brother-in-law a thrashing before I leave you for the merits of the case."

"Well—I reckon it's about time for me to be moving!" said Jerome.

Now Jerome Fenwick was none the worse for the frequent libations in which he indulged; at least not in his own opinion. For he had firmly resolved, on entering the green baize doors of the "Columbian Hotel," not to drink to excess, and he decided in a high spirit of resolution. Only—for sure, the sanded floor did surge to and fro, a little —and the great logs in the chimney changed places with each other in a most unaccountable manner, and the voices around him sounded now close to his ear, now far away, as if the speakers were peering into the distance. For Jerome Fenwick, with wry wide open eyes, and a turgid sensibility upon his set features, reiterated to himself that he was all right—he right as a trivet!"

"Because, you see!" soliloquized Jerome, aloud, "I'm a married man—and—and—[utter I owe to society! I can't be drunk, because——"

He caught at the arm of his chair as it seemed to give a sudden lurch, selling-ward.

"I—I guess I'll go back to Rosa!"

In the act he instant a sudden electric thrill seemed to send the hot blood back to his heart. Rosa! yes, it was her voice, speaking in the barroom beyond. Her voice—and in what company!

A glass of gin-sling—and be quick about it. Rehawl none of your dishwater compounds! make it hot and strong, mate!"

"Mrs. Fenwick!" ejaculated mine host, in dismay.

"Yes—Mrs. Fenwick—what are you staring at? My husband's here, isn't he? and I've come to keep him company. I'm tired of staying at home by myself. If he's going to make a regular practice of getting drunk here, why he may at well do it in his wife's company—and I'll be drunk too!"

"Rosa!"

"Yes, my dear. Good evening to you, gentlemen," she added, turning to the startled assembly and taking a long draught. "Upon my word, this feels warming after the night air. You are right, Jerome; it is better than crouching over the fire at home. You're right, my dear—you're always right, and hereafter I'm going to follow your example."

"Rosa, are you mad? Come home, child," whispered Jerome, in an agony of mortification.

"Another glass, landlord!" ejaculated the amazon, giving Jerome a push with her elbow. "I didn't know I was a good. Try a taste of it, Jerome!"

"Rosa, I command you to come away."

"What for? Haven't I as much right here as any one? You said you didn't care whether I came or not—and I won't go!"

Jerome vipped the drops of perspiration from his brow and upper lip.

"Do not mortify me thus, Rosa," he whispered. "Remember these spectators."

"Well, you've mortified me enough times; and it's a poor rule that won't work both ways. Landlord—I—think—I'll—take——"

She paused abruptly, the two glasses of fiery liquid were apparently beginning to tell on her feminine brain. Her head fell on her breast, the bare eyes stared stonily into space, and the arms fell heavily at her side.

"She's gone!" exclaimed Joe Hyde, who had watched this crisis with intense interest.

"I will trouble you to mind your own business, sir, if you please," returned Jerome Fenwick, haughtily. Ah, his pride was touched to the quick now. "Clark Tiffany, will you help me carry my—my wife home? Take a quiet match to walk. Good heavens! that I should have lived to see this day!"

Clark Tiffany advanced, with a subdued grin upon his countenance, to assist his boon companion. But it was no easy task they had undertaken. Her weight was totally limp, and it required a burden before; from the tip of the pink worsted hood to the heavy-shod mouse-skin boots was a mass of elasticity or animation, as the two men dragged their slow way over the hard, frozen ground.

"Abused child!" disgustfully muttered Fenwick, wiping his streaming forehead.

"Just what you've done yourself a dozen times," remarked Tiffany, changing the arm that supported the leaden shoulders. "Jupiter! who'd suppose a woman could be so heavy!"

"Myself! Of course I have—more shame to me!" retorted Fenwick. "But a woman—and my wife!"

"I don't know that it's any worse for a woman than a man," said Tiffany; "only it's not customary."

"One thing is certain," resumed Fenwick, after a moment's silence, and his tone was full of deep pantomime earnestness "after this night's work, I will cut off my right hand before I will re-enter that accursed bar-room. You drank my last glass of liquor!"

"That—that's not fair!" sleepily muttered the burden. "Just when I've begun to enjoy myself! Rosa—it's not fair!"

A smothered groan escaped from Fenwick's lips.

"Before heaven I register the vow!" he exclaimed. "From this hour, I will never touch intoxicating drought save as a medicine or cordial! As he spoke, the red, flickering stream of light from the room curtained window glanced athwart his face.

"Home at last!" he exclaimed, with an accent of relief, as saint Tryphosa flung open the door.

The old lady sat knitting there, and was wrestling contentedly on the burnished bricks of the old-fashioned hearth, and—wonder of wonders!—Rosa sat in her lap, in the arm-chair, fast asleep and coquettish silk apron, stitching at a narrow strip of linen.

"Rosa!" gasped Jerome, in open-mouthed astonishment. "You here?"

"Where else should I be, Jerome?" demanded Mrs. Fenwick, with exemplary calmness.

"Do we live in the age of witchcraft? Am I dreaming, or am I wide awake? Am I in full possession of my ordinary senses?" exclaimed Jerome Fenwick, turning to the limp figure on the kitchen settle.

No longer limp, however. It had suddenly risen up, straight and vigorous as a young pine, and Rosa, with her face flushed and her eyes full of light, was confronting her husband.

"Jerome Fenwick, Mr. Fenwick," said Charley Warner, with dancing eyes and defiant brow, "Mr. Fenwick," said Jerome, still bewildered, "who is this?"

"It is my brother, Jerome—my brother Charley," replied Rosa, with a proud smile and blush. "I couldn't stop him—he would go, and aunt Tryphosa encouraged him."

"Well, Rosa, I said it's not my wife!" said Jerome, extending his hand. "Welcome home from the wars, brother-in-law! but I question whether you've been doing much that has been concerned during the three years of your absence can equal the victory you have this night gained."

"Jerome, husband! Rosa," and you have not—"

"But he has thought!" interposed Lieutenant Charley, leisurely lighting a cigar among the smouldering chestnut embers. "I hear witness to that; but he has also had a most unconscionable to abstain for ever more from the Columbian and all that appertains thereunto. Isn't it so, you fiend, that so loudly held up your hand?"

"Well, I thought you were rather heavy," acknowledged Clark Tiffany. "But—no offence, sir —you don't see how your head stands [illegible] two glasses of gin."

"Ah, that's because I've been in the army," responded Lieutenant Warner, with charming frankness. "What, little Rosa, crying again?"

"Don't mind me, Charley; it's only because I'm so happy."

"Happy, eh? Well, it isn't my way of expressing happiness," said Charley, "but then, as aunt Tryphosa is crying too! Well, I've read a good many puzzles in my day, but a woman is the most inexplicable of 'em all!"

Lieutenant Warner did not know that upon that night he had drawn all Rosa's wifely kindness, fears and inward distresses were swept away into the past. She was crying only because she was happy.

TREATMENT OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.—The treatment of paralysis and apoplexy by the application of the Galvanic Battery, has been attended with considerable results, which are detailed in the Medical Times and Gazette. Thus, in the case of a woman, aged forty-seven, with paralysis on the 5th of December, became worse on the 6th, and when Dr. Althaus saw her, on the 9th of December, he was in a perfectly stupor, could not be roused to attend to the slightest answer of questions, and the left side of the paralysis thought himself well. The water her was found to be 104° Fah., and it was quite remarkable. The patient, a full-bodied woman, died on the 11th of March, and no hope to doubt that the galvanic treatment she was giving, and on the 10th of March Dr. Althaus wrote to say her case was of apoplexy on its worst form, unconscious for forty-eight hours before the appearance of convalescence. The medical seems to be now admitted by very high authorities as one of great power in many nervous disorders.

A WILD FLOWER.

BY E. V. B.

I sooner for a type, little Jennie, of thee,
Among the bright blossoms and buds,
But the garden held nothing so solid and so free,
So I searched in the meadows and woods.
Soon I found that both suited my pet,
And it puzzled me much which to choose,
A wild rose and daisy with morning dew wet,
For the emblem I took the wild rose.

If you wish, little Jennie, the reason to know,
Why the wild briar rose I select,
Its virtues and faults I'll endeavor to show,
And leave you your own to detect.
It is artless and innocent, guileless and free,
Yet hardy, and playful, and wild,
It sports in the wind with a bright cheerful glee,
As pleasant, and winning, and charming to see,
As the mirth of a frank, merry child.

It is full of sweet love; its fond arms are round
Every tendril and branch that grows near;
It caressingly stoops to the grass on the ground,
And kisses and clasps every object around,
And blushes o'er the bumblest as dear.

These are very bright virtues, but now for its faults—
For I'm sorry to say it has many;
Glad please don't suppose the remark quite applies,
At least it does not in her friends' partial eyes
To our own little wilding rose, Jennie).

It will not obey, but rudely every turn
Thwart's one's wishes; it's very self-willed;
In short, the wild rose "don't like lessons to learn,"
And objects much to be educated.
It has very sharp thorns and it oft wounds the hand,
That would tenderly prune and train it;
It is careless and wilful, and does not take heed,
To be gentle and patient in manners and deed,
With those who, in love, would restrain it.

Now I leave you, dear Jennie, to judge for yourself,
If the wild rose would not be improved
If "arse and education" were lavished, gentle and meek,
And the wishes of others more ready to seek,
And be even more fondly beloved.

GUY'S FOLLY,

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE HERTON ST JOHN.

CHAPTER XVI.—THE SECOND CATASTROPHE.

Ten quiet days passed over Thornton Heath. The heavy raindrops fell at intervals upon the leaves.

Peals of thunder rattled along the earth, like the horrible roar of some hungry animal creeping nearer and nearer to his prey.

The flashes of faint lightning lit up the tangled trees in front of Nightingale Lodge, but the fullest fury of the storm had not yet burst forth.

The rain fell in fitful showers at shorter intervals, as a woman crept eagerly across the path towards Walter Raymond's window. Her face still as she hurried along the road—faster yet as she reached the gate, and ran rapidly across the lawn, and then she paused for breath—for the hall door, which the servant was answering her peremptory summons.

"Who are you?" asked the girl, who, besides being ill-tempered at being disturbed in the middle of reading, was not much prepossessed in her favor.

She was certainly not one to prepossess any one.

She was of a spare, wearen figure, encumbered with no superfluous flesh; and her wet garments clinging closely around her, disclosed it to advantage.

"That matters not to you, young woman," replied the new-comer, haughtily. "It is sufficient for you to know that I bear a message for Mrs. Raymond, and I must see your mistress immediately."

"What name shall I give?" asked the girl, hesitatingly.

"None. Say I come from your master—that is enough. I am in haste, and wet, too, to the skin; be quick."

The girl saw nothing for it but submission, and entering the drawing-room, told her mistress of this new arrival.

Ella was sitting by the fire alone, reading, or at least seeming to read, looking very quiet and sad, as she bent over the book, and her head drooped.

In a reverie she evidently was, for she did not notice the entrance of Susan until she spoke.

"Please, ma'am, here's some one wishes to see you."

Ella started.

"What is it? Is my husband returned?"

"No, ma'am; but this person has a message from him."

"Admit him at once, then."

"It's a woman, ma'am; and she's all over wet, and don't seem a nice sort of party at all."

"Never mind," said Ella, smiling; "she can't eat me. Admit her at once."

In another moment the old woman was ushered in. Ella's first thought was the same as Susan's.

"She is certainly not prepossessing."

"Pray be seated," she said. "You have a message, I believe, from my husband?"

"I have, ma'am," returned the woman; "here is a letter from him."

A presentiment of evil stole into Ella's breast as, taking the letter, she eagerly opened it.

It ran as follows:

"DEAR ELLA—Do not be alarmed. I have had a slight accident—nothing about which you need worry yourself, but I wish to see you at once. Mrs. Cassel, the landlady of the Black Oak, near Tenville—the village about six miles from Thornton Heath—will bring you to me, and explain to you anything you wish to know. Come and see me, dear Ella. I long for you to be here; for when I am ill, you know, I hate to be with strangers.

"Your affectionate husband,

"WALTER RAYMOND."

Ella's cheeks blanched as she read the letter. When she had concluded, she turned hastily to Mrs. Cassel.

"What ails my husband?" she asked.

"He has had a fall, ma'am," replied Mrs. Cassel; "but it isn't much, I think, though he groans fearful, and cries out for you."

"I must go at once," said Ella, rising. "He will think it unkind in me to delay."

As she spoke, a blinding flash of lightning seemed to rush across the room, and a roar of thunder rolled fearfully over the earth.

"How can I go? In this storm we shall lose our way, or perhaps our lives!" she said painfully.

"Fear not, my lady," returned Mrs. Cassel. "I have money given me by Mr. Raymond, and we can obtain a carriage at the inn. I will go and order one while you dress."

"No, no!" cried Ella; "let us go together. I will not detain you long."

So saying, she passed from the room, but returned in a few moments, and it was not long before they were hurrying rapidly along the dark road, through the blinding storm.

About six miles from Thornton Heath stood a small roadside inn.

By the vivid flashes of lightning which illuminated the summer night, it appeared, at the first glance, to be nothing more than an ordinary laborer's cottage; but on close observation might be noticed a small signboard over the door, on which the words "Licensed to sell beer by retail, to be drunk on the premises," were rudely painted.

In the little sanded tap-room, which was dimly lit up by two tallow candles, a few rustics sat smoking and drinking, discussing the local politicals, remarks on the weather, and the probable continuation of the storm.

They were all startled on by a young girl, who reflected their cups when empty, and replenished their tobacco boxes.

Jane Cassel was her name, and she was the only daughter of the widow who kept the little wayside house of entertainment.

Jane was a blonde—not an unusual complexion in England—but her form was well made and proportioned, which was not always the case in rural districts.

She was dressed in a neat cotton fabric, fitting tightly to her figure from waist to throat, her fair neck encircled by a neat linen collar.

Her face was not of that Grecian cast which some people are afraid to admire so much for its masculinity and statue-like appearance; but thoroughly English—round and merry, and beautifully blooming. Her eyes were large, of a deep blue color, liquid and fascinating; the brows were faultless; the eyelashes long and drooping. Her lips full, and of a ripe cherry color; her mouth small. It was a purely Saxon face.

She appeared restless and uneasy; her countenance every now and then betraying her lips.

Her mother was absent, and she was anxiously waiting for her.

At the back of the inn was a kind of outhouse, which had all the appearance of a section cut off from the main body of the house portion of the "Hollow Oak," as the house was called.

It contained two rooms, poorly and meanly fitted up—one a sitting-room, the other a sleeping apartment.

The former was generally used by Jane, when the mother was at home, as a room in which to do her needlework.

In the bedroom she slept, in company with the old woman, who performed the humble drudgery of the inn.

Jane Cassel, as I have said, seemed anxiously, and even nervously, expecting some one, and desirous, too, of getting rid of her customers.

So no one obtained any satisfaction from her, though they tried hard to bore her drawn enough; for she strenuously refused to answer any questions, and was even rude to the young man-darkly alluded to by those who wagged their heads generally, to be her sweetheart.

At last, at last, when she could go to the door, and in spite of the rain, look down the road for some moments, both to the right and the left.

Presently the door was slightly unbarred her guests somewhat rudely, the sound of carriage wheels was heard in the distance.

Jane ran away on their scarce for dismissing her visitors, she was disappointed, and entering the room, suddenly sat down by the fire.

In a moment after the carriage drew up at the door, and in another instant two persons entered the bare—one silent, morose, dark-looking—the rural; the other, agitated, restless, glancing hither and thither fimidly and impatiently.

These two persons were Mrs. Cassel and Ella Raymond.

"Is he here?" asked Ella, eagerly.

"He is not here," said Mrs. Cassel. He is in the other part of the house."

The girl put in a word just as Ella moved eagerly towards the inner door.

"He has not arrived yet, ma'am."

Mrs. Cassel glanced at her, with fury in her eye.

But the words—whether they were intended for a warning or not—were not heard by the person for whom they were intended.

Ella passed out into the back garden with the old woman, and they walked across it rapidly, until arriving at the outhouse, Mrs. Cassel opened the door with a key, which she left in the lock, and hurried Ella to enter.

No sooner had Ella done so, than the door was closed violently, and she found herself alone.

The room in which she found herself was a square, low-roofed apartment, with a black beam crossing the ceiling, a piece of ragged carpet concealing part of a rough, uneven floor, windows strongly barred, four chairs, an old sofa, and a ricketty table, on which stood a lamp, whose feeble rays cast a glimmering doubt, as it were, over all the objects around.

The first feeling in Ella's heart, when she turned round and saw that Mrs. Cassel had not entered with her, was one of bewildering fear.

Then, seeing that the door of a bedroom was near her, a new emotion filled her breast.

"Fool that I am, to think of peril! My husband lies ill yonder, and Mrs. Cassel has forborne to enter, because she wishes us to be alone."

With these words half formed upon her lips, she took up the lamp, and eagerly entered the bedchamber.

One glance was sufficient to confirm her former fears.

The bed was empty; the room, too, devoid of any sign of life; and the windows, as in the other case, were barred.

She rushed back into the other chamber, and tried the door. But the sound which had alarmed her had been too true. It was locked on the outside.

A few moments were expended in vain cries and beatings at the door; then she sank down, weeping and despairing, upon the sofa near the entrance.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Cassel had passed into the front room, and rudely dismissed her customers.

Then she closed the door, and wound up by dealing Jane a vigorous slap upon the ear.

The girl looked up in surprise and anger.

"And pray what's that for, mother?" she cried.

"For not keeping your mouth shut!" returned Mrs. Cassel, doggedly. "Do you suppose for a moment that she thinks he is coming? She thought her husband was here, ill!"

"Then if you were entrapping her, you should have told me so!" said the girl, sullenly. "How am I to know what you're up to? However," she grumbled, as she went about her work, "I'll take good care that she shan't be kept here against her will, poor thing!"

That night passed wearily for poor Ella.

Her enemy, whoever he was, did not arrive; but in the middle of the small hours, a gentle tap at the window roused her, and she started up from the bed upon which she had thrown herself, fully dressed, to snatch, if possible, a few hours rest.

"Whoever this is," she thought, "this is the one of whom I am in dread."

And as the thought passed through her mind, she sprang up, and hid herself behind the curtains.

The summons was repeated, louder and more eagerly than before.

"A friend—a friend!" cried a voice. "Come to the window!"

She recognised the voice of a woman, and at once leaving her place of concealment, hurried to the casement.

"Who is there?" she asked.

"Jane Cassel. You are here against your will, are you not?"

"Yes, I am. Can you release me!"

"Fear not—I will, though not to-night. I may not stop, or my mother will discover that I am here. Good-night!"

Then the sound of her footsteps was heard as she re-crossed the yard, and Ella Raymond was once more alone.

CHAPTER XVII.—THE DEVIL'S DYKE.

On the evening of the day when Clara Arbuthnot had fled with Denzil Harcourt, and about the same hour when Mrs. Cassel called on Ella Raymond, and inveigled her to the "Hollow Oak," a family council was being held at Arbuthnot Villa, at which Lady Anne, Sir Arthur, the two parchmenty daughters, and Mr. F. A. Davit were present.

Great consternation had been excited throughout the house when the inmates heard of the flight; but no one for a moment doubted the name of the person with whom she had fled.

Lady Anne—deadly in her hatred towards Denzil Harcourt—had ordered immediate pursuit, which was foiled, however, by the falling of Sir Arthur from his horse, and the fact that the groom would not carry on the pursuit by himself, because, in the first place, he did not know the way; and, in the second, he had no right to detain the fugitives if he caught them.

Sir Arthur Arbuthnot, who had received severe injuries, was lying on a couch, while Lady Anne, her daughters, and the lawyer were seated at the table.

The subject of their conversation was the flight of Clara at first; and then, having satisfied herself that nothing could be done to punish Denzil Harcourt at present, Lady Anne made a sign to the lawyer and quitted the room.

In a few moments Mr. F. A. Davit cleared up his papers and followed her.

For a moment Sir Arthur appeared undecided; then, in spite of the pain he was suffering, he rose, and, leaving the room, proceeded after them.

The drawing-room being occupied by the Misses Arbuthnot, the lawyer and his client went into the dining-room, and closed the door; while Sir Arthur, kneeling down outside, applied his eye dexterously to the keyhole.

It was as he had suspected, the conversation had reference to Sir Robert Arbuthnot.

"I have received a letter from my husband," said Lady Anne; "it is a horrid scrawl. Let me read it to you."

She read aloud:

"Madam—I have escaped at length from madness and from your prison. Your tenure of title and fortune is short—enjoy it, therefore, while you may. Let me tell you one thing, however: I have found the wife who has so long been thought to be dead—found her just in time to save her life, if not her happiness. Expect me on Wednesday night, at ten. I shall not be alone.

"ROBERT ARBUTHNOT."

"Well," said the lawyer, "and what do you propose to do?"

"I shall see him, and——"

At the moment she was speaking a loud knock was heard at the door, and it was not long before the usual courtesies had been exchanged, and the injured baronet stood in the presence of the woman he had once thought to be his wife.

Lady Anne rose without a movement of a muscle of her countenance, saying:

"Pray be seated, sir. What is the object of this visit?"

"I come to ask you if you are inclined to make some arrangement by which my daughters will be comfortably settled. As for yourself, I am not compelled, either by remembrance of past kindness or by law, to give you anything; but yet, considering that you were once in the position of a wife to me, I will consent to make you a reasonable allowance."

Lady Anne glanced at him with well-assumed surprise.

"Really, sir," she cried, "you take me quite by surprise. I do not in the least understand your meaning. May I inquire your name?"

The lawyer gazed at her in admiration, mingled with astonishment.

"Whew!" he whistled; "she is a woman!"

Sir Robert grew pale with anger.

"Madam," he cried, "this is no time for jesting. My features have so little altered that I have been recognised at once by my bankers and my old lawyers, and you are in my power completely. So do not endeavor to play off any such games as this on me, as I am not in a frame of mind to be trifled with. Remember, Anne, that I have no kindnesses to remember—nothing but a long, weary succession of painful, terrible years—nothing but madness, and imprisonment worse than death. Seek not, therefore, to impose on me; but say at once, what am I to do for you, and your son and daughter?"

Lady Anne rose hastily, giving, as she did so, a rapid glance at Mr. F. A. Davit.

"I leave it to my lawyer," she said, in a husky voice. "Whatever he thinks right, I agree to. I would rather not prolong the interview myself."

With these words she quitted the room; Arthur, while she passed out, crouching down in a corner, where, amid the shadows, he could not be perceived.

He had crouched down here when his father passed, though he could scarcely prevent himself from rising and asking his blessing.

And yet such is the inconsistency of human nature, the man who experienced this filial tenderness was, at that very same moment, regretting the delayal of a dreadful crime!

Sir Robert Arbuthnot and the lawyer had soon settled their business, and Sir Robert departed, stepping into his carriage and driving off without asking to see his children.

It was not under the roof of Lady Anne that he wished such a meeting to take place.

As the carriage reached the end of the lane, going very slowly along the rough country road, a figure darted from concealment behind a tree, and hurried on after it.

This was Lady Anne.

Following the vehicle as fast as her legs would carry her, she at length reached a house where the carriage had stopped, and saw Sir Robert descend and enter.

With a growl, as it were, of anger, Lady Anne stood near and watched.

The carriage waited, and presently he reappeared, dismissed it, and walked away in the direction of the cottage where Clara Arbuthnot and Denzil Harcourt had arranged their flight.

In order to reach the cottage he had to pass over a deep and darksome ditch, known in the neighborhood as the Devil's Dyke.

The Devil's Dyke was one of those mysterious places which, having no certified origin, are popularly ascribed to the evil one.

Its banks were overgrown with bushes, and down below, on the surface of the stagnant waters, floated huge masses of chickweed and other noisome aquatic vegetation, occasionally interspersed with tufts of tall bulrushes and flags.

Toads and frogs hopped and sprawled about the banks, while efts and sticklebacks swam about the muddy tide.

At different parts, dark, unwholesome-looking yew trees reared their sombre heads, throwing weird, fantastic shadows on the dark mud.

There was something repulsive in the aspect of the place, the cultivated eye turned away from the loathsome sight; the nose recoiled with disgust from the unwholesome vapors and exhalations which arose from the fœtid pool.

Sir Robert Arbuthnot, who appeared to know his way well, directed his steps towards a point where a rude bridge had been formed by laying a few planks across the chasm.

It was at this point that the old baronet, who had been buried in a brown study, started back in affright, as a tall, dark figure seemed to rise, as it were, from the depths of the Devil's Dyke!

EXECUTION OF THE ASSASSINS

In the Old Penitentiary at Washington, D. C.

WE present, to-day, the final scene of that great tragedy which commenced in a theatre on the night of the 14th of April, and closed on the 7th of July on the scaffold. Of the eight persons tried for complicity in the late infamous conspiracy, four only were adjudged to death—Mrs. Surratt, the Lady Macbeth of the hideous drama; Payne, the desperate assailant of Secretary Seward and his household; Atzerodt, who was selected to murder President Johnson, and Harold, the infatuated associate of Booth.

The Place of Execution was a large grassy yard, surrounded by an exceedingly high wall, which was planted with soldiers thoroughly armed. The north side of the yard was enclosed on three sides by columns of soldiers drawn up in regular order, the side next to the penitentiary being so arranged as to admit ingress from the prisoner's door. Within this enclosed space the gallows was erected. It was composed of a strong beam raised horizontally in the air, about 20 feet from the ground; at irregular intervals four ropes dangled from it, each noosed at the end. The beam was supported by three props, one in the centre, and one at each end. These props came all the way to the ground, where they were morticed in heavy bars. Midway a floor was laid—20 by 12 feet—reached by 15 steps, railed on either side. On this floor was the trap, the giving way of which would plunge the criminals into futurity. At the foot of the gallows four coffins were placed, at the edge of four newly dug graves.

Enter the Criminals.

The wicket opens, and a woman pinioned appears. She was dressed in black, bonneted and veiled, and walks between two bare-headed priests. One of these held against his heart a crucifix of jet, while both of them utter the service for the dead. Four soldiers, with muskets at shoulder, followed, and a captain led the way to the gallows. After her came Atzerodt, preceded by two officers, a Lutheran clergyman and another armed squad. Harold came next, guarded in a similar manner. The most determined and dignified of all the culprits, Lewis Payne, completed the procession, which numbered somewhere about 20 persons, more or less.

When they reached the platform, the prisoners were placed in four arm chairs, stretching across the stage, in the rear of the trap doors. The warrants for their execution were then read to the prisoners by Gen. Hartrauft.

Painful Scenes.

At a quarter to 12, Miss Anna Surratt, accompanied by a gentleman, arrived, and was shown to her mother's cell. Although her face betrayed the deepest sorrow, her bearing was so firm that some began to think she had succeeded in obtaining a respite for her unhappy mother. Shortly afterwards the sister of Harold was admitted to her brother, and then came Miss Atzerodt. Payne had no sorrowing relative to unman or console him; nor did he seem to need any, for despite the enormity of his crime it was impossible to look upon his composed face, or demeanor, without regretting that such magnificent material should have been wasted upon a malefactor. He was the worthy twin brother in crime of Wilkes Booth. In the course of of about half an hour they all were led forth from their harrowing interviews, sobbing, and half swooning with anguish. They were all attired in deep mourning, and their appearance gave additional solemnity to the imposing scene.

Mrs. Surratt.

The general interest was almost entirely concentrated on Mrs. Surratt and Payne, for the obvious reasons that one was a woman, and the other displayed a dignity, worthy of a nobler cause. Mrs. Surratt was a well formed, medium-sized woman, with light gray eyes, round face, dark brown hair, firm chin, and well shaped, compressed lips. Her age was about 45, which she scarcely looked, notwithstanding the mental suffering she must have undergone since the eventful 14th April. That she was a woman of great nerve is evident by her bearing throughout the trial, and certainly now at the closing scene she exhibited a nerve never found in a woman, except in the very sternest class. It was a painful thing to see her ascend step by step, her hands manacled, and walking conscious that every eye was upon her. Her face, however, betrayed more of sorrow than fear, which gave her face a ghastliness seldom seen in the living. Now and then one of the priests would apply the crucifix to her ashen lips, as though to support, by spiritual stimulants, her sinking system.

On the Scaffold.

At ten minutes past one o'clock the order of the War Department, embracing the President's executive order for the excution was read, and the limbs of the prisoners were pinioned. The caps were drawn over their heads, Mrs. Surratt exclaiming in a faint voice, "Don't let me fall," and in consequence of her fainting condition was supported by two priests and an officer, who retained their hold upon her until the drop fell. As the noose was being adjusted on Atzerodt's neck he exclaimed, "Gentlemen, beware." Then after an interval of about two minutes, said, "Good-by, gentlemen, who are before me. May we all meet in another world."

The Last Moment.

At 25 minutes past one o'clock the officers in charge of the scaffold made some preconcerted motions to the attendant soldiers to stop back from the drop, and then with a motion of his hand the drop fell, and the bodies of the criminals were suspended in the air.

The bodies fell simultaneously, and swayed backwards and forwards for a few moments. Mrs. Surratt appeared to suffer very little, Payne and Harold, on the contrary, writhed in apparent agony, the first for about two minutes and the latter for about five minutes. The muscles of their feet and hands were visibly contracted. Payne's hands, which were more exposed than the others, became purple, as did his neck, where the rope was fastened. Atzerodt's agony, like Mrs. Surratt's, seemed to be of but short duration.

Cutting Down the Bodies.

At twenty-five minutes before two o'clock the grounds were cleared of persons, except the officers of the prison, the guard and the reporters. The bodies hung until ten minutes before two o'clock, when the surgeons, Dr. Otis, U. S. V., Dr. Woodward, U. S. A., and Dr. Porter, U. S. A., proceeded to examine the remains.

The first one examined was Mrs. Surratt, the next Payne, then Harold, and, lastly, Atzerodt. Life was found to be extinct, and at two o'clock the bodies were taken down, as follows: First, that of Atzerodt, then Harold, then Payne, and, lastly, Mrs. Surratt. Before being placed in their coffins the bodies were again examined by the surgeons, and no signs of life found. The ropes were taken from their necks and the bodies placed in the coffins for burial.

Burial of the Bodies.

The crowd having separated, the bodies of the executed assassins were placed in the graves and covered with earth.

Bodies Claimed.

The friends of Atzerodt, Harold and Mrs. Surratt, have asked for the bodies, and it is understood they will be given them by the government.

Scenes around the Prison.

The only elevated point from which a view of the scaffold could be obtained, was the windows of the Arsenal building. These were crowded with spectators who remained.

Thus the curtain has fallen on the last scene in the the melancholy drama, that began with the murder of President Lincoln.

GRAND BALL AT SARATOGA.

SARATOGA! Saratoga! Surely the immortal bard would not have asked "what's in a name?" had he known of thee, ah, thou most delightful of summer resorts. Thy very mention suggests visions of hops, beauty and flirtations. One mentions thee under his breath, as though thy glories rendered thee sacred. But persiflage apart, Saratoga is, without exception, the most popular of all the summar resorts of wealthy Americans. Its walks, its drives, its magnificent hotels, its healthful waters, beautiful adjacent scenery, and above all, its "excellent" society renders it unrivaled.

Among the hotels of this Mecca of pleasure-seekers, "chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely," stands pre-eminent the Union Hotel of world-wide fame. The Messrs. Lelands, its proprietors, have achieved a reputation, which only needed the éclat of the recent grand banquet and ball at the new opera house, to pass into history.

As our readers have already been informed by the daily prints "the affair" was in every sense of the term a pre-eminent success. The dinner was delicious and the dance was divine. The clatter of plates and the clink of glasses were surpassed only by the swells of delightful music, and the graceful move of nimble feet. "Fair women were there and "brave men's" lips drank ruby wine, responsive to ruby lips, and "eyes looked love to eyes that looked again." Altogether it was a scene "take it for all in all, we ne'er shall look upon its like again," The opera house was not wholly completed, but such excellent arrangements were made, that all deficiencies were obviated. The coup d'œuil of the ball was superb. The uniform of the officers, the gay dresses and magnificent toilettes of the ladies, the plain contrast of the civilians' dresses, the patriotic decorations of the imposing ball-room—all these, mingled with "the many figures of the graceful dance," composed a brilliant sight indeed—a sight worth a week's travel to behold. Space would fail us to tell who were there; all we can say is, that it was the most brilliant ball of any season. Gens. Wallace and Sickles were present; among other notabilities, Col. Hillyer and Judge Hoffman were prominent "committee men," while the ladies, God bless them, can neither be named or described—so great was their quantity—so brilliant their quality.

HOT!

Oh! isn't it hot!
Oh! isn't it hot!
And all is soft and clammy and damp,
No need to moisten your postage stamp!
The very stones!
Have lost their tones
And don't re-echo the p'liceman's tramp!
And, oh! isn't it hot!

And, oh! how I hate my hat—
That box of roasted air!
With the hard hot brim that presses its rim
With all its main might into my brain,
And it leaves its red trail there!
And how I hate my blessed boots,
Of pedal agonies the roots!
Sources of throes and pangs and shoots!
And socks with agravating holes—
Socks that ruck all under the soles!

And then my collar!
Peruvian Rolla!
(Convenient rhyme)
In thy blest time
You wore no trousers, choker, collar, brace or sleeves,
But went about,
In-doors and out,
In what young ladies call "square bodies," I believe.
Oh! isn't it hot!

ROMANCE IN THE LIFE OF AN AUTHOR.—It was in 1740. One day, in the afternoon, I was engaged in literary labor, when my valet informed me that a lady, closely veiled, wished to see me. I went to meet her with a kind of presentiment. "Mon Dieu, sir," she said to me, when seated on the sofa, in my little saloon, "nothing can be more simple. I have come from London to offer you my hand." Though habituated to all sorts of strange adventures, I confess I must have exhibited great surprise. Fortunately the lady had raised her veil. I had already marked her grace and distinction. "Madam, you see me confounded by so much happiness; although marriage has never been among my habits, permit me to throw myself at your feet, and kiss the hand you deign to offer me." In fact, I threw myself, completely bewildered, at the feet of Miss Stafford. Madam, will you explain?" "Nothing is more simple. My fortune is in my own hands. I had resolved to bestow it only with my heart; but where to bestow my heart was the difficulty. I have waited and sought. I should have waited and sought still, had I not met with one of your works. You recall, without doubt, for you have infused in it so much of yourself, 'Les Egarements du Cœur et de l'Esprit'—a delicious book, which has but one fault, which is—that the heart has too much head. After having read it 20 times, I ordered my horses, embarked at Dover, took the post at Calais, and arrived yesterday at Paris. I lost an entire day (for I should have seen you yesterday) in recruiting myself, and in finding you out. Heaven be praised! you are there just as I imagined you, young, witty and distinguished." Thus spoke Miss Stafford. I was so little prepared for an adventure of this nature, that I knew not what to say. I gazed into her beautiful eyes, sparkling with love and pleasure. Another in my place would have imagined he was the dupe of an adventuress, without heart or money; for my part, I felt at once that Miss Stafford was really Miss Stafford—that is to say, one of the handsomest, richest, and most adorable young ladies of Great Britain. We were not married until a delay of six weeks. Miss Stafford wrote to her father, who was only softened at the fifth or sixth letter; he ended by yielding; not because I was the author of celebrated works but because I was the son of M. Crebillon, a Burgundian gentleman, member of the French Academy, author of "Electre and Rhadamiste."

ASSASSINATION is a crime which seems to have peculiarly and invariably the curse of heaven upon it; for in perusing the annals of the world we find it has not only not been followed by success, but it has been usually a fatal blow to the cause in support of which the murderer has done the deed.

ONE who knows that no credit is ever given to his assertions has the more right to contradict his words.

EXECUTION OF THE CONSPIRATORS, MRS. MARY E. SURRATT, LEWIS POWELL, (ALIAS PAYNE,) GEORGE ATZERODT AND DAVID E. HAROLD, IN THE PRISON YARD OF THE OLD PENITENTIARY, WASHINGTON, D. C., JULY 7.—FROM SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTISTS, D. B. GULICK AND W. T. CRANE.

THE OLD STORY

BY CHAS. EDWYN HURD.

I.

"THE sails are set, and the breeze is up,
And the prow is turned for a northern sea—
Kiss my cheek, and vow me a vow
That you will ever be true to me!"

"I kiss your cheeks, and I kiss your lips,
Never a change this heart shall know
Whatever betide, come life, come death—
I love you so! ah, I love you so!"

II.

O but the northern nights are keen!
The sailor clings to the frozen shrouds—
A kiss burns hot through his dream of home,
And his heart goes south with the flying clouds.

The maiden laughs by the garden gate,
(Dreams of love are the soonest o'er!)
Kisses fall on her lips and heir—
And the world goes on as it went before.

CHAPTER XXXIV.—POOR FRANK'S LETTER.

MAUDE shut herself in her own rooms after her interview with Francis, and refused to see any one but Julia. She wanted some one to cling to in her sudden distress, and was fain to throw herself upon the Irish girl's bosom for consolation.

Then Julia Desmond had her revenge. It was very sweet to see the woman who had usurped the cup of prosperity once held to her own lips brought down so low. The pleasure that thrilled through her breast as she held Maude Tredethlyn in her arms, and heard her declare, amidst passionate sobs, that Francis had been false and base and wicked, and that she was the most miserable woman in the world, was a sensation more exquisite than Miss Desmond had ever known before. For the honor of humanity, that wicked pleasure did not last very long. The daughter of Patrick Macnamara Ryan O'Brien Desmond was not altogether base. Maude was at her feet, and she was avenged.

"You have your fine house and your carriages still," she said, as the young wife sat on the ground at her feet, in the abandonment of her sorrow; "you could never have married Francis Tredethlyn for any other reason than the wealth he could give you. What does it matter to you whether he is true or false? You never loved him."

"No," answered Maude naively; "I suppose not. But it is so shameful of him to care for anybody else. And from what Harcourt Lowther says, he does care for that horrible person; and to leave me, Julia, day after day, and to be—there—all the time in a garden—smoking—looking as much at home, as if he had lived there all his life. I never can forgive him, Julia!"

"Of course not," Miss Desmond replied promptly; but I don't see that you need make yourself so very unhappy about his conduct. You will have a formal separation, I suppose. Your papa, or your papa's solicitors, will manage that, no doubt; and you will live quietly in a smaller house than this. You will not be able to go so much into society, you know; for it is so difficult for a woman that is separated from her husband to escape scandal, however careful she may be," Julia added, with considerable satisfaction. It is so nice to sit in the dust and mingle our sympathetic tears with those of the fallen powers who have lately queened it over us."

Maude's sobs redoubled.

"Society!" she exclaimed. "I hate society! Yes, it's no use talking, Julia. I know what you're going to say about my going out to three parties a night, and so on; but I don't like it—nobody likes it. They get into the whirlpool, and there they are. I used to think sometimes," continued Maude, dropping her voice and speaking with some slight embarrassment, "that Francis and I would get to understand each other better by-and-by, and that we should lead quite a Darby-and-Joan sort of life, doing a great deal of good and going out much less. But, of course, that hope is quite gone now. I can never endure his society again. I could never trust him. And oh, Julia, I did trust him so implicitly! I had such a belief in his goodness that I despised myself for not being better worthy of him.

It was not till the next morning that the letter which Francis had left in the library was delivered to his wife. She was sitting in her boudoir, with an untasted breakfast before her and the sympathetic Julia on the other side of the table, when her maid brought the missive which a housemaid had discovered at daybreak on her master's table, two or three hours before Mr. Tredethlyn's valet found the little bedroom behind the library untenanted, and perceived that his master had not slept at home.

The Cornishman's letter was very simply worded. Maude opened it hastily, in the hope that it might contain some justification of her husband's conduct. But he did not even allude to his delinquencies, and confined himself to bidding an earnest and friendly farewell to the wife who had never loved him. Tears of disappointment, humiliation, regret, poured slowly down Maude's cheeks as she read the letter. It was the first time Francis had written to her since her marriage; and there was something almost strange to her in the sight of his bold commercial hand, whose accustomed regularity had been a little disturbed by the writer's agitation.

"MY VERY DEAR WIFE.—I write to you for the first time since it has been my privilege to address you by that sacred name. If I could tell you the pride and happiness I once felt in that privilege, when first you laid your hand in mine, when first I heard you called by my name, I should be a very different person from what I am; and then it is possible this letter need never have been written. I write to bid you good-by, Maude; and I think the best proof I can give you of my love is the proof I give you now, when I bring my mind to the necessity of our separation, and resign myself to the knowledge that I may never see your face again upon this earth.

"I will not tell you how soon I discovered your indifference—how soon another person demonstrated to me that your feeling towards me was even something worse than indifference; that it was dislike and contempt which I inspired in your mind. My dense ignorance of the world, and your amiable nature, would have prevented my making this discovery of my own accord. But there are always plenty of those 'good-natured friends' that the man in the play talks about. I found such a friend. If you have any curiosity upon the subject, Rosa Grunderson, who is a good, honest-hearted little girl, will tell you the name of the man who opened my eyes to the full misery of my position. In writing this, Maude, I have no thought of reproach against you. To me you have been and always will be something so bright and lovely as to be amenable to none of the common laws which govern common natures. When you offered to be my wife, you yielded to a generous impulse; and it is I who deserve reproach for having been so base, in my blind selfishness, as to accept the sacrifice you were willing to offer in repayment of a fancied obligation. I cannot undo the past; but I can at least set you in some manner free from the fetters you forged for yourself under the influence of that brief enthusiasm. So long as I live, one of the miseries of my life will be the knowledge that I shut you out of a brighter fate; and that I deprive you of a more worthy companion—that the greatest sacrifice I can make in atonement of the past will only make you the lonely widow of a living husband. But I can at least rid you of the society of a man whose presence inspires you with disgust and loathing. Oh, Maude, I am quoting your own words; spoken so deliberately, so coldly, that I should be indeed mad and cowardly were I to shrink from accepting them in their fullest import. I might have doubted until to-night; I might have hugged myself with the notion that a liar and a scoundrel, for his own base purposes, had taught me to think myself despised and disliked; but your own lips have spoken, and I can doubt no longer. Oh, my darling, my pet, my beloved, this seems so like a reproach; but it is not, it is not."

"I am going to South America. When you read this my preparations will, no doubt, have begun. If possible, I shall sail immediately. Of all the men who ever left England for that fiery young world out yonder, there was never, perhaps, any one better adapted to be happy and successful there than I am. I bid good-by for ever to the idle dissipations, the drunken orgies, in which I have sometimes found distraction but never happiness. And I begin a new life in a new field of labor. My uncle's money has been the root of all my misery, and I shall take very little of that useless gold to the other shore. I don't think I was ever guilty of any great folly while I was a poor man; but since I have been a rich one, my life has seemed one long mistake.

"I write so much about myself and my own plans because I do not want the memory of me, or of any sorrow which I may feel in this parting, to cloud the brightness of your future; and I understand your generous nature well enough to know that you will be happier if you can believe that I am happy. Oh, Maude, if you could know how anxious I am that the life before you should be a bright and happy one, you might almost forgive me for the pain my selfish folly has inflicted upon you! My poor, generous-hearted girl! my innocent darling! you thought it was so light a thing to link your life to the life of a man whom you could not love; and you have borne your burden so quietly. I cannot release you from the chain that binds you to me, but I will do my best to make that chain a light one. And, for the rest, I go to a country in which life and death walk hand in hand together. I take with me all an ignorant man's love of adventure, a soldier's indifference to danger. Wear your chain patiently, darling—you may not have to wear it long. But one word of warning from the man who has loved you so foolishly, and, until this night, so selfishly. You have married hastily once. Weigh well what you do if ever you marry again. If you accepted for your husband an ignorant west-country boor when you married me, I was at least an honest man. If I die, Maude, and you are free to make a second marriage, be sure that the husband of your choice has something of your own noble character—as well as some smattering of the accomplishments that please you, and the tricky jargon about art and literature which passes for cleverness. I was anxious once to make myself a gentleman for your sake, Maude, and when we have been visiting together, I have listened to the men's talk; I wanted to find out how it was done; and you could never guess how spurious some of that brilliant conversation sounds to a man who only listens. I used to read some of your Mudie books in my own room sometimes of a morning—Froude and Carlyle, Burton, Barth, and so on; and I've heard men laying down the law about them at night, and I have known from their talk that they hadn't read a page of the book itself, and were only airing the second-hand opinions picked up out of a review.

"I saw you shudder once, Maude, because I didn't know it was the right thing to say 'Barkley Square;' and pronounced the word as it is spelt. But, oh, what bosh I've heard the Barkley-squarers talk sometimes about things I do understand! I've heard a man at a dinner-party talk about our convict system sometimes, and transportation, and Van Dieman's Land, till I've been inclined to get up and do something to him with a carving-knife; and oh, the self-satisfied manner of the creature, and the way he has lifted his eyebrows and looked at me if I ventured to express any opinion upon the subject. In South America there may be fever and disease—perhaps privation and danger; but there will be no Barkley Square. I may meet with Aztecs, who may maltreat or even assassinate me: but they won't lift their eyebrows and begin to whisper about me the moment I enter the room. And I shall never hear them say, 'Oh, the rich Tredethlyn, is it? Gad, what a clodhopper!'

"Why do I write about these things, Maude, when I am writing to bid you good-by for ever? Only because I want you to believe there is something wanting even in the perfect world in which you live. If my death should set you free in your youth, marry again dear, by all means; but marry a man whose truth and loyalty have been proved by a life of unblemished honor; marry a man who has made his mark upon the age—who has done something; for such a man is scarcely likely to be a scoundrel. Above all, darling, accept my warning against one man; do not marry Harcourt Lowther.

"All the privileges that you have enjoyed during your bondage you shall retain in your freedom. Before sailing I shall make my will, in which you will be left residuary legatee, and recipient of the bulk of my fortune. While I live your income will be large enough to support the style in which you have lived during the past year: and there will be a wide margin left for indulgence of every impulse of your generous heart. I shall place full directions as to the management of my fortune in the hands of my solicitors, Messrs. Kursdale & Scardon; and they will call on you by my direction to explain your position immediately after receiving my instructions. You will find yourself the mistress of the larger part of the income derived from my late uncle's investments and from the Cornish estate, and you will have no further trouble than to sign your name now and then, when the lawyers want you to do so. In the interim I enclose a check for £500, so that you may not be without ready money. Your father's affairs are now, he tells me, in a very easy state, and I do not leave him in troubled water. He may consider you his creditor for the interest of the thirty thousand sunk in his business; and I don't suppose he will find you a very importunate one.

"And now good-bye indeed. I leave you with all confidence in your noble heart, your high principles. You are too good and pure to be otherwise than happy Far away on the Pampas, lying under canvas, with the long silvery trail of the moonlight on the grey expanse beyond my tent, the whisper of faint winds among the long grasses sounding in my ears, I shall think of you, and see you happy in the old English garden at Twickenham, loitering on the terrace by your father's side. In that trackless loneliness, fever-parched perhaps, and far away from the chance of water, I shall think of the blue English river, but never think of it without seeing your image standing by the tide, your bright face reflected in the glassy stream. Oh, Maude, I have loved you so dearly, so fondly; and now that it comes to saying good-bye, it seems almost as difficult to tear myself from this lifeless sheet of paper, as it would be to take my lips away from yours in a last long kiss. My pet, my darling, God bless you and good-by! Think of me sometimes; but never with pain. Some midnight, when you are waltzing in a crowded ball-room, with a brazen band braying in your ear, and the hum of a hundred voices round about you, think that in some savage wilderness a man is kneeling under God's blue sky, praying for you as few people are prayed for on this miserable earth; think sometimes, if a special peace comes down upon you like the cool shadow we have watched drop slowly upon the river when the sun was down—think, darling, that I am saying, 'God keep and guard her safely through the night! God fill her heart with peace and gladness, whether she sleeps or wakes.'

"And so, my own dear wife, for the first and last time in my life, I sign myself your true and loyal husband,

"FRANCIS TREDETHLYN."

When Maude had finished her letter, which lay in scattered sheets at her feet, she fell back upon the sofa-pillows in a dead faint.

CHAPTER XXXV.—ELEANOR DROPS IN UPON ROSAMOND.

IT is strange what virtues we are apt to discover in the thing we have lost. After recovering from her fainting-fit, Maude Tredethlyn wept as bitterly for the loss of her husband as if he had been the first choice of her maiden heart.

"I had no right to take his love as I take the love of my dogs," she thought; "giving him nothing in return for his devotion."

At first as she read her husband's epistle, she smiled at his talk of leaving her, and thought how easy a thing it would be to lay her hand upon his shoulder and draw him down to his old place at her feet. She forgot all about the cottage at Petersham when she thought this. And then, as she read further and further, she recognised the solemn meaning of the letter, and felt that it was indeed a farewell.

Maude read Julia little bits of the letter, leaving off every now and then to demand pathetically what she was to do.

"He surely c-c-couldn't write like that, Julia, if he were what Harcourt Lowther says he is," sobbed Mrs. Tredethlyn. "He says I spoke to him coldly and deliberately. Oh, if he could only know what a passion I was in! There must be some horrible mistake; and if there is, what a wretch I must have seemed to him last night! Julia, advise me! give me some help! My husband must not go to America. There is a whole week for me to act in. What am I to do?"

Poor Maude turned the leaves of her husband's letter, and looked wistfully at the blotted pages. If she could have only found some brief explanation of that Petersham business anywhere—in a postscript—a parenthesis! But there was none; and Mrs. Tredethlyn put the epistle into her pocket, and looked at Julia with a very rueful countenance. Unluckily, she forgot that she had brought no specific charge against her husband, but had only attacked him in that vaguely denunciatory manner which is so essentially feminine.

"You ask me for my advice," Miss Desmond said. "If I am to give it frankly, I must own that in your place I would not touch Mr. Tredethlyn's hand in friendship until he had accounted fully and conclusively for his presence in that garden yesterday. I would permit no reservations on the part of my husband; and I should be inclined to think that a secret kept from me was only another name for a wrong done to me."

"I will insist upon an explanation from my husband; but before seeing him I will do what I should have done yesterday. I will go to that cottage at Petersham, and see the lady who was sitting in the garden with Francis yesterday afternoon. It is my right as a wife to know my husband's friends."

"You will see the—person," exclaimed Julia, on the tips of her lips, as the French say.

"I will. You'll go to Petersham with me, won't you, Julia dear?"

"Of course," answered Miss Desmond promptly; "it is a part of my metier. But how do you mean to go?"

"Oh, we'll drive—and we'll go at once, Julia dear, if you're sure you've finished breakfast," added Mrs. Tredethlyn, looking piteously at the cup of stagnant chocolate and unbroken roll, which bore witness to her own incapacity to eat or drink.

Of course Julia declared that she had breakfasted—as completely as a companion had any right to breakfast, she inferred by her manner; so the two ladies adjourned to their apartments.

Julia enacted her part of confidante very creditably during the drive from Stuccoville to Petersham, and submitted graciously to be left in the carriage, in a shady curve of the winding road, with the Skye terriers and the last new novel to keep her company, while Mrs. Tredethlyn went alone to face her rival.

Perhaps Maude's heart sank just a little with something akin to fear, as she tripped along the dusty road in dainty, high-heeled boots and flounced petticoats, whose embroideries flickered to and fro in shadowy arabesques upon the sunlit ground. Imagine anything that is incongruous, or absurd, or impossible, and it will be scarcely more out of keeping than this picture of Maude Tredethlyn going alone to meet her rival, under the shelter of a point lace parasol. And yet this injured young wife was as sincerely miserable as if she had worn sackcloth and ashes.

Mrs. Tredethlyn went straight to the cottage with the old-fashioned iron gate and the ivy-bordered wall. Everything here had a prim countrified prettiness of its own; and looking across the smooth lawn, Maude saw a slender girlish figure in a cotton-dress bending over a flower-bed, while a little boy stood by with a tiny watering-pot, whose contents he dribbled industriously over his own toes.

Maude's summons was responded to by an elderly woman in black. This person carried her card to the lady in the cotton-dress, and then swooped down upon the little boy with the watering-pot, and carried him away struggling.

Maude, without the citadel, watched the girlish face as it bent over her card. She expected astonishment, confusion, defiance—anything except what she saw, a half-pleased smile, a look of hesitation, and then a little glance towards the gate, and then a cry of remonstrance to the elderly person now invisible.

"Oh, Mrs. Clinnock, how could you leave that lady outside? The key! ah, I see it's in the gate."

Maude's fancied rival had crossed the little lawn by this time, and Rosamond was only separated from Eleanor by the iron scroll-work.

"Dear Mrs. Tredethlyn, how very rude you must think my nurse! But so many people have called, out of mere curiosity I am sure, and I am so afraid of strangers—Francis knows that—for he knows how often he has begged me to see you; and it was only yesterday that I gave way, and said he might tell you all about me. But I didn't think you would come so soon," said Rosamond, with sudden tears welling up to her innocent brown eyes. She had opened the gate and admitted Maude while she talked, and the two women were now standing face to face.

Mrs. Tredethlyn's mystification was depicted upon her countenance, which at first expressed only her complete bewilderment; then a chilling expression came over her face, a scornful smile curved her lip, and she looked at her rival with her head poised as haughtily as ever Eleanor's could have been when she offered Lord Clifford's daughter that agreeable choice between the bowl and the dagger.

"Oh, I see," she thought; "this person is trying to disarm my suspicions by her cool impertinence."

"It was so kind of you to come," murmured Rosamond, timidly. She was beginning to feel rather afraid of this haughty lady, who made no response to her warm greeting. "I did not think that I should see you so soon."

"No, I dare say not," said Mrs. Tredethlyn; "I should scarcely imagine that you expected to see me at all."

Rosamond, otherwise Susan, clasped her hands and flushed crimson to the roots of her hair.

"Ah, then, you too are unkind, like my father," she cried, piteously. "You do not believe what Francis told you."

Maude was almost too indignant to remark that piteous accent.

"By what right do you call my husband by his christian name?" she asked indignantly.

"By what right!" stammered Susan, alarmed by the angry tones in which the question had been asked. "What else should I call him? I have called him Francis all my life, except when we were children, and then I called him Frank. Oh, he has been so good to me, Mrs. Tredethlyn; and he knows that the marriage was a real one. Oh, pray, don't look so coldly at me; don't doubt my word and his. I am as true and pure a wife as you are, though I have no husband's arm to lean upon, though even the name my husband gave me may be a false one."

Maude stared at the earnest face in new bewilderment. Not even jealousy could distort the expression of that face into anything but innocence.

"What does it all mean?" she cried at last; "who and what are you?"

"Susan Turner, Oliver Tredethlyn's daughter, and Francis Tredethlyn's cousin," answered Susan, considerably puzzled in her turn; "who else could you suppose me to be, Mrs. Tredethlyn? Surely Francis told you all about me, or you could never have known where to find me."

"No, he told me nothing," exclaimed Maude; and then she pounced suddenly upon poor astonished Susan, and kissed her as she had never in all her life kissed any one before.

"Oh, you dear!" she cried; "oh, you darling! To think that you should be only his cousin after all, when I thought that—when I was wicked enough to think—"

Mrs. Tredethlyn did not say what she had thought, but bestowed another shower of kisses upon Susan.

"You pet!" she exclaimed; "and to think that I should never guess you were his cousin; and that he should never tell me, the silly fellow! And he let me go on at him too last night as if he had committed all sorts of crimes, and did not even deny them. And you are like him too. Yes, I'm sure you are; there's an expression about the eyes. Yes, there really is. Oh, how dearly I shall love you! I remember Francis speaking of you once; but he was very reserved upon the subject, and I did not like to question him. And so you really are his uncle Oliver's daughter! Then we are cousins, you know, dear; almost sisters—and I never had a sister—or even a friend who was quite like a sister," added Maude, with a remorseful recollection of Miss Desmond waiting in the carriage.

She could have run on for an hour at a stretch, in her delight at the discovery that her husband was not a villain. The two women walked up and down the lawn together, while Susan related all her sad little history, and received Maude's tender assurances of sympathy and love.

Maude wanted Susan to go straight home with her in the carriage, but the Cornish girl clung to her sheltered home, and the iron gate that screened her from intrusive strangers.

"I am not used to the people amongst whom you live," she said; "it is very kind of you to wish to take me—but I could never be happy amongst strangers; and Robert and I are so happy here."

There was a little embrace, and then Susan opened the gate, and Maude tripped away, and informed Julia that her mythic rival had melted into a "little cousin," who was "all that there is of the most charming," "and all young girl," "a candid angel," whom Mrs. Tredethlyn was ready to take to her heart forthwith. Julia found it a great deal harder to sympathise with Maude's happiness than with her misery.

But the happiness did not last very long; for on inquiry at Stuccoville, Maude found that her husband had not been home, and on penetrating Holbornwards to Gray's Inn, to the disgust of the languid footman, she met with a second disappointment in the offices of Messrs. Kursdale & Scarden, who had heard nothing of the absent Mr. Tredethlyn. After this Maude drove homewards with a very sad countenance, and was glad to shrink from even Julia's sympathy, and to hide herself in her own rooms, where she paced disconsolately to and fro, listening for the crunching wheels and banging door of a hansom cab, and stopping every now and then to look hopelessly out into the monotonous street.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—TOO LATE.

ALL through the dreary day, and far into the still more dreary night, Maude Tredethlyn waited and listened for her husband's coming.

"He never could be so cruel as to leave me because of a few foolish words," thought Mrs. Tredethlyn; "he could not be so unjust as not to give me the opportunity of explaining myself."

But on reading Francis Tredethlyn's letter for the third or fourth time, Maude discovered how complete the estrangement was that had divided her from her husband.

The second day passed, and there was no Francis. In the evening Maude dispatched a messenger to Mr. Kursdale with a note of inquiry about Francis: had his solicitors heard or seen anything of him, and so on. The messenger was to wait an answer. But as old-established solicitors do not usually reside in Gray's Inn, the messenger found only darkness and stout oaken doors when he obeyed his mistress' behest. Maude wrote another letter that evening, addressed to Harcourt Lowther, and containing only these few lines, hurriedly written, and with all the important words underlined:

"DEAR MR. LOWTHER—Have you seen my husband since the day before yesterday? He left home on Tuesday night, and I have not seen him since. I am terribly anxious about him. I have been to Petersham, and have seen the lady. We were quite wrong about her, and I am ashamed of myself for having been so foolish. She is a near relation of Frank; and his conduct to her has been most noble. Pray find him immediately, if possible, and show him this letter. Yours truly,
"Thursday night. M. T."

A pleasant letter this for Harcourt Lowther to receive the next day as he lay helpless on a lodging-house sofa, with his head and face sadly dilapidated by the effects of a fall under a shower of broken wine-glasses and cruets.

He groaned aloud as he read Maude's missive. When Harcourt had read her letter, he tossed it over to his brother.

"Do you know how to reckon that up?" he asked. "What does it mean?"

"The lady's anxious inquiries about her husband may be read in more ways than one. This letter may be only intended to put you au courant as to the state of affairs. Unluckily that ugly scar about your nose will prevent your calling on Mrs. Tredethlyn for some weeks. But I don't mind being brotherly for once in a way; and I'll look in at the Stuccoville mansion this afternoon, if you like."

Harcourt, after a little deliberation, consented to this arrangement.

"Of course I have seen nothing of Francis since Tuesday, which is perfectly true; only you need say nothing of Tuesday night—curse him!"

The diplomatist had no opportunity of serving his brother by any sentimental hints about secret sorrows and moral illness, for Maude sent Julia Desmond to receive her visitor, and to hear anything he might have to say about Francis. Mrs. Tredethlyn would see no one, and would go nowhere. Miss Grunderson had called, and sent up penciled supplications upon backs of cards, imploring her dear Mrs. Tredethlyn to see her, if only for a few minutes; but Maude had been inexorable. So Rosa was sent away disconsolate.

A long miserable week wore itself slowly out, after the night in which Francis Tredethlyn had turned his back upon a house, which he had never been allowed to find a home. Through all the week there were no tidings of Maude's departed husband; but when the week was over a formal letter from Mr. Kursdale acquainted her with Mr. Tredethlyn's arrangements for her welfare, and with the fact that he had embarked the day before on board the steam vessel Kingfisher, bound for Buenos Ayres. The news inflicted as great a shock upon Maude as if her husband's letter announcing his intended departure had never been written. She had written him a penitent letter, and inclosed it to Mr. Kursdale, entreating that gentleman to deliver it to his client whenever he saw him. She had not thought it possible that, even if Francis persisted in his intention of leaving England, he would leave without an interview with his solicitor. But when Maude drove poste-haste to Gray's Inn, and presented herself in the lawyer's office, she found that there had been no interview. Francis had communicated with his solicitor by letter only, and his clear and concise epistle bore the date of the very day on which he was to start for Plymouth, whence the Kingfisher was bound for.

The letter thus dated had arrived at the lawyer's office after business hours; and when Mr. Kursdale opened it next morning there was little doubt that the Kingfisher was outward bound with Francis Tredethlyn on board her. Maude made a confidant of her husband's solicitors. The despondent wife told Mr. Kursdale that Francis had left home in consequence of a slight misunderstanding, and she implored him to assist her in bringing about her husband's speedy return.

"But do you think he has really sailed?" she asked. "Do you think he can have been so cruel as to leave England without even giving me the opportunity of imploring him to remain?"

Mr. Kursdale shook his head gravely.

"There is nothing in his letter to me which indicates indifference to your wishes," he said; "it is only a business letter, but, in a practical way, it is the strongest evidence of a husband's devotion that ever came to my knowledge. We lawyers are a matter-of-fact set of men, and we are apt to form our conclusions in a matter-of-fact way. What other people would treat as an affair of sentiment, we look at as an affair of figures; and I must say, Mrs. Tredethlyn, that, gauged by that standard, your husband comes out nobly."

"But I want him to come back to me," Maude exclaimed simply; "I don't want to be rich—or to live like a woman of fashion. He wrongs me most cruelly when he thinks that I married him for his money. I married him because he was good to my father. Do you think that I could accept the income which that letter places at my disposal, knowing that my husband has left his native country because of me? Tell me what I am to do, Mr. Kursdale. I know that Mr. Tredethlyn is unhappy, and that a few words from me would set all right. What am I to do?"

"I will send a clerk off to Plymouth by the next train," said Mr. Kursdale, with his hand upon the spring of a little bell beside him. He spoke as coolly as if he had been talking of sending a clerk over the way. "If by any chance the Kingfisher has not sailed when the young man arrives, your husband will have the letter before dark. If the Kingfisher has sailed, the letter must be sent on by the next mail. At the worst, Mr. Tredethlyn may be back in six or seven weeks."

In six or seven weeks! It seemed a very long time; but on receiving the lawyer's letter announcing her husband's departure, Maude had fancied that he was lost to her for ever. Her disappointment was very bitter the next day, when she received a note from the solicitor, informing her that the Kingfisher had sailed twelve hours before the clerk arrived at Plymouth.

After this Maude could only await the result of her letter. Six or seven weeks seemed such a weary time as she looked forward to it; and it might be as long as that, or even longer, before any tidings from Francis could reach her. She went to her father, to pour her sorrows into his ear; but, though he received her very affectionately, she could see that he blamed her severely for the folly which had driven Francis Tredethlyn from his home.

While she was thinking very penitently of the past, and weaving pleasant schemes for the future, while she was perpetually counting the days which must elapse before Francis returned to her, always supposing that the remorseful words of her letter found their way straight to his heart, as she implicitly believed they would; while she was praying daily and nightly for his safe preservation in tempest and danger, Maude Tredethlyn took up the Times newspaper one morning as she loitered listlessly over a lonely breakfast-table, and the first paragraph that met her eyes was the announcement of the Kingfisher's total destruction by fire, and the entire loss of passengers and crew.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—AN IGNOMINIOUS FAILURE.

HARCOURT LOWTHER had his copy of the great journal on the day when Maude read that horrible paragraph. Roderick had called at Stuccoville during Mrs. Tredethlyn's seclusion, and had heard of the Cornishman's departure and the name of the vessel he had gone in from Julia Desmond. The schemer turned deadly pale when his brother read him the brief account of one of those terrible catastrophes which come upon mortal travelers now and then, to teach them how frail is man's hold of that wondrous power by which modern science has learned to rule the elements. The coolest villain who ever planned a comrade's destruction must surely suffer one sharp pang of remorse when he knows that the hand which has so often clasped his own is really cold.

"And so Maude is free—at last! Do you know, Roderick, it seems to me as if I had lived twenty years or so since my return from Van Dieman's Land? and now that the luck turns, and the winning color comes up for the first time, I feel as if I had almost outlived the power to care much about it. Roderick!" cried the invalid, with a sharp suddenness that startled his brother, "did Folson tell you there was any serious damage to my head by that ugly fall the other night? I know he has talked to you about me. I heard you and he muttering together yesterday, when I was lying half asleep in the next room."

Mr. Folson was the medical man who had attended Harcourt Lowther after the scuffle with Francis, and who had brought all his science to bear for the preservation of the handsome face.

"Folson said very little about the damage you got in the row," the attaché answered very coolly; "but he told me you must drop your liberal consumption of that sort of thing, or you'd find yourself very speedily in Queer street." Mr. Lowther pointed to the smoke-colored bottle. "While you were teaching that fellow Tredethlyn to drink himself to death, you ought to have learnt how to keep yourself alive by not drinking," he said presently. "However, I don't want to say anything unpleasant, but you really must cut your very intimate acquaintance with the brandy-bottle, if you want to improve your opportunity, now that Mrs. Tredethlyn is a rich widow. If you don't look sharp I shall throw over the Grunderson, and go in against you."

Harcourt smiled superciliously.

"I am not afraid of you, for more reasons than one," he said. "Maude is a curious girl. I sometimes fancy my own chance is not quite so good as it was. My soul is weary, Roderick; and now the chance has come, I'm not the man I was. Perhaps after all, the simple truth of the matter is that I am suffering from an attack of blue devils. I'll tell you what I'll do, old fellow. As the ugly scar across my forehead has dwindled into a romantic-looking badge of bygone prowess, and the variegated hues of my countenance are rapidly falling into an interesting pallor, I'll get you to send me round a hack from Parson's and I'll take a spin in the Park, and the fresh air will blow my old self back again, I dare say. I'll meet you at the Metropolitan afterwards, if you like," added Harcourt, naming an adjacent restaurant at which the brothers had been went to dine occasionally.

"No, thanks. I dine at the Grunderson's."

"Déjà! We go fast, my friend!"

"If your military experience had extended farther than the superintendence of penitent burglars, you might have known that where the assailing party is weak, a fortress must be taken quickly or not at all. I declared myself to Rosa this morning. She is delighted with the idea of flourishing at foreign courts in ecrasante pink dresses. How I shall tone her down, poor child! I am to speak to papa Grunderson this evening, over his wine. He consumes the best part of a bottle of old port every night. Rose tells me that he is an indulgent old party, and that I shall not have any difficulty in bringing him to book."

"Then you really think of marrying?" asked Harcourt, thoughtfully.

"Really think of marrying! Of course I do."

"I thought, perhaps, you might have some lingering regard for—that other person."

"I thought I told you that I didn't care to discuss that subject," he said haughtily. "Drop it, if you please. There are plenty of disagreeable things in your life, I dare say. I'll look in at the stable and send you the hack. A bientot!"

Nearly a week elapsed before Harcourt Lowther approached the woman who had once been his plighted wife. The schemer wanted to be sure of his triumph. One interview with Maude, one look in her face would be enough to tell him whether his hold on her was undiminished. A nervous restlessness that was foreign to his temperament had come upon him since the tidings of the Kingfisher's destruction had reached his ears; and he could not endure anything like uncertainty or suspense.

He called at Stuccoville one morning. He was told that Mrs. Tredethlyn would see no one, but that Miss Desmond would receive him, if he pleased.

He did please, and was ushered to where Julia sat writing at a table near the window. There was a door opening from Mrs. Tredethlyn's dressing room into this morning-room; and as Harcourt entered at one door, a pale, wan creature in black appeared at the other.

It was Maude—so changed, that a sudden pang shot through the schemer's heart as he looked at her.

Was the loss of her husband so deep a sorrow that it should change her like this?

She was drawing back, when he ran to her and seized her hand.

"Maude!" he cried, passionately. "I must speak to you. Surely you are not going to treat me like a stranger."

She tried to take her hand from his, but he held it firmly and drew her into the room; as he did did so, Julia, who had risen on his entrance, went quietly out at the other door. Maude and Harcourt were alone.

"What can you have to say to me?" asked Mrs. Tredethlyn. "It is cruel of you to force yourself upon me at such a time as this. I have grief enough and trouble enough without being tortured by the sight of you."

Harcourt Lowther looked at her aghast.

"Tortured by the sight of me!" he repeated.

"Yes," answered Maude, indignantly. "It was your fault that my husband left me. It was you who planted base suspicions in my mind when there was no need for suspicion. Why did you poison my mind against the best husband a woman ever had? How could you be so base as to repay his trusting friendship with such malicious treachery?"

"Because I loved you, Mrs. Tredethlyn, and I believed that your husband had wronged you."

She looked up at him presently.

"Have you anything more to say to me?" she asked coldly.

"Have I anything more to say! Are you mad, Mrs. Tredethlyn, that you ask me such a question? I respect your natural sorrow for the terrible fate of your husband; but I should despise you if you were so false-hearted a prude as to affect forgetfulness of what is due to me."

"There is something due from me to you?" she asked haughtily. "What is it?"

"The fulfillment of your broken promise. I have waited, Maude, and waited patiently. Hopeless but patient, I have given you a disinterested devotion which is without a parallel in the history of man's sacrifice for the woman of his choice. Now that you are free, I ask some atonement for the past, some reward for my patience. Tell me that the past is not quite forgotten. Why do you look at me like that? Have I been the dupe of a coquette from first to last, Mrs. Tredethlyn, and does your husband's death only leave you free to jilt me again? Have I been fooled to the top of my bent by a woman who has never loved me?"

"No, Mr. Lowther," Maude answered, very quietly; "I did once love you. But my love died—a very sudden death."

"When you discovered the advantages of a wealthy marriage for the penniless daughter of a commercial defaulter," cried Harcourt.

"No; my love for you was a girlish fancy, if you like—though heaven only knows how deeply I felt for you in your exile—how willing I would have been to resign my imaginary wealth for love of you, if you had asked me to do so. But you never did ask that. You did not want the wife without the fortune. When you came home and found me engaged to another man—about to sacrifice myself in a mercenary marriage, as you thought—there was yet time to have exacted the fulfillment of my promise. I loved you then, Harcourt Lowther. A word from you, and I would have told Francis Tredethlyn the truth, and demanded my release. He was far too generous to have withheld it. My first foolish love died on my wedding day, Harcourt, when you stood by to see me married to Francis Tredethlyn. From that hour to this you have been no more to me than any other man who has paid me the conventional attentions which I imagined I had a right to receive. If I had ever seen more than this in your conduct, Mr. Lowther, you would have found me quite capable of asserting my position."

"The world has chosen to see a good deal more than conventional courtesy in my attendance upon you, Mrs. Tredethlyn," answered Harcourt.

He saw Maude's look of unutterable scorn—a look which revealed her to him in a new and higher light, and inspired him with a more passionate love than he had ever felt for her yet—and at his worst he had loved her.

"Maude," he cried, in a sudden fit of mingled rage and despair, "why do you goad me to say these things? I know how detestable I seem to you. And yet, as there is a heaven above me, I have loved you truly from first to last. Pity me if, while I prayed for no better fate than to face the enemy's guns on an Indian battlefield, I was a coward in social life, and dared not brave genteel poverty even for your sake. Pity me if I shrank from thrusting myself between you and a wealthy marriage. I had been poor all my life and I knew what you have never learnt—the horrors of a gentleman's poverty. I have smiled at your girlish talk of pretty cottages and tiny suburban gardens, an elegant little drawing-room, in which you and I might spend the winter evenings together with our books and music. The poor gentleman's cottage is never pretty; the poor gentleman's drawing-room is never elegant. His wife's tastes may be ever so simple, his own aspirations may be ever so pure, but poverty countenances no taste, permits no aspiration. His wife is fond of music, perhaps. Heaven help her! she cannot be sure of an hour in which her piano may not be seized by the broker. She delights in flowers; but the nosegays she arranges so gaily to-day may entail a writ for the florist's account to-morrow.

"And you ask me now to fulfill my broken promise. Have you inherited a fortune, Mr. Lowther, or how is it that your ideas upon matrimony have altered?"

The schemer flushed crimson to the roots of his hair, and then grew deadly pale. For the life of him he could not answer that question. He could not say "My position is unchanged, but you are rich. Give me your fortune and the heart I did not choose to claim when it was unaccompanied by fortune."

"Had we not better wish each other good morning, Mr. Lowther?" Maude said, after a little pause. "Your visit is ill-timed and most unwelcome. Your presence reminds me of cruel wrong done to a noble friend, a devoted husband, whose worth I have learned only too late; whom I have loved unconsciously, only to discover the depth of my affection when its object is lost to me for ever."

"You loved your husband!" cried Harcourt, with a cynical laugh; "you seem determined to astonish me to-day. You loved your husband?"

"Yes—dearly and truly; and love his memory better than ever I loved you. I shall go back to my father's house, and my life will be one long atonement for the past. I tell you this, Mr. Lowther, in order that you may understand that we must be strangers to each other henceforward."

She laid her hand upon the bell as she spoke. Harcourt Lowther stood for some moments looking at her. A strange compound of passionate admiration and vengeful fury flamed in his eyes.

"I have sometimes wondered at the madmen who murder the women they have loved; but God help you, Maude Tredethlyn, if I had a loaded pistol in my pocket to-day!"

He folded his arms, locking them together with a convulsive suddenness, as if he could only thus restrain the impulse by which he would have struck her down where she stood defying him; and then he turned, and slowly left the room.

After that he left the noisy regions of the Strand, and wandered across one of the bridges out to some dismal waste ground in the neighborhood of Battersea—a remote and forgotten tract, that was almost as lonely as an African desert; there he laid himself down amongst the rubbish of a deserted brickfield, and cried like a child.

LAYING THE CORNER STONE OF THE NATIONAL MONUMENT

At Gettysburg, Pa.

We regret that our space will not allow us to give more than a brief epitome of the solemn ceremonies observed at Gettysburg.

Our illustration will show how worthily the nation remembers the brave men who fell at that turning point in the late struggle.

The scene will be for ever memorable, for there were gathered on that historic spot the surviving actors in that mighty drama.

Gen. Howard was there, as orator of the day, Gens. Meade, Doubleday, Geary, Slocum, Gov. Curtin, Gens. Sykes, Thomas, Mott, Crawford, &c., with Col. Halpin, Dr. Tyng, and other civilians of ability.

The National Cemetery extends along the north-west face of the cemetery hill, one end of it touching the Baltimore turnpike, and the other reaching along the Taneytown road, on the western slope of the hill.

Major Gen. Howard, the orator of the day, was presented by Gen. Geary. His discourse was admirable in all respects.

Col. Halpine, better known as Miles O'Reilly, then delivered a very spirited ode on the subject, which was much applauded. It was on his return from this patriotic duty that he met with an accident while in the cars, which will confine him to his room for some weeks.

After Gov. Curtin had acknowledged by words, and Gen. Meade by a bow, their acknowledgments for the enthusiastic welcome of the people, the ceremonies were declared at an end.

BARNUM'S WHITE WHALES.

MR. BARNUM has long arms. The old rhyme about his famous city of Nuremberg might, with the change of name, be applied to him:

"Barnum's hand
Goes through every land."

Mr. Barnum's writ runs in all the ballwicks of nature, Giraffe in South Africa; Lepidosiren annectens snugly nested in the hard mud of its Congo; Alligator in Southern swamp; Python coiling around Javanese forest trees; or White Whale swimming in Arctic seas—are each and all liable to apprehension, by this unresting searcher, or by his "sufficient deputy."

It is two White Whales that he has seized this time, and refusing bail, he has lodged his prisoners in the Museum, to answer all charges, and be examined by all who want to see if they recognize these very large slippery customers.

These two White Whales came to the American Museum a week ago and more. They came from Labrador, along which coast they live. They sometimes grow to be 40 feet long, though usually not over 20 feet. The White Whale is an intelligent fish, and some time ago one was taught to draw a boat with a young lady in it round his tank. The way in which the present whales were caught and brought to New York, is this:

Mr. Barnum keeps an agent on most inhospitable coast all the year round, to obtain any whales or other "small deer" that may turn up thereabouts. This agent keeps watch over the shore whale fishery. That fishery is conducted by means of large traps, called "krenl" or "crawl." The crawl is a pound, or pard, built with strong stakes below the low water line, on a somewhat V-shaped ground plain, opening to seaward, about four rods wide, and planted in a locality where the white whales are in the habit of coming.

We will suppose that the fishermen are on the watch, and it is nearly low water. A little way off shore there is some spouting—a school of whales is coming. They quietly swim along in, spouting here and there. They are heading for the crawl; they're pretty near it. The fishermen shove off at either side, get beyond the very unsuspecting cream-colored victims, and with splashings and spattering in the water, drive the poor fish carefully up into the crawl, and there they detain them until it is quite ebb tide, when the whales lie aground, or so nearly so, as in be helpless. Now they get a strong lasso and fasten it round the whale's tail. That powerful noose once hitched fast the poor beast is their mercy, and unless Mr. Barnum's agent serves a subpœna on them, and removes the prisoner to the higher jurisdiction of the Museum, the poor whale's lives are promptly let out of them with long harpoons and lances, and in great torrents of red blood, quivering and struggling, the innocent monsters die. They skin them, and make a peculiarly strong and enduring shoe leather of the hide. They cut off their fat and try it into oil. They let the carcass float away to the fishes, and—exit whale.

But the present whales, being rescued for Mr. Barnum, were hoisted into a schooner and "laid up in lavender"—i. e., in a quantity of wet sea-weed—to keep them damp. A special guard with a sponge is also set to wet their blow-holes for them; for if this half-respirable breathing apparatus gets dry it cracks and spoils, and the poor whale turns sickly and dies; thus they came sailing along up the St. Lawrence river, to a point about 200 miles below Quebec. Here they were slung again, with bands and tackles, upon a rail-car: and in a special train, just like any other great potentates or princes of whales, may were sent trundling up into country to distant New York, the grateful salt water and sea-weed still swathing them, and two men keeping "watch and watch" over their highly-important blow-holes. At all the stations along the road, our whales received an ovation, just like Gen. Grant or the President; and just like Gen. Grant, they didn't make a speech in reply to anybody; keeping their blow-holes silently wet with cool water, as the general if he will forgive us a word better suited to a politician than an honest soldier), keeps his blow-hole silently dry with hot tobacco.

We wish the white whales an agreeable summer sojourn in Mr. Barnum's tank, and a profitable study of the civilization of New York, and a successful escape from "the hospital fies of the city," as the bards of the Common Council, who would be perfectly sure, if they could, to take them and show them the "institutions," and keep their blowholes wet with champagne all the time, which would teach them bad habits.

HINTS TO BATHERS.

As this warm season, when bathing is so popular, it will be well to observe the following practical hints, which we take from the London Sanitary Magazine:

On first plunging into cold water there comes a shock which drives the blood to the central parts of the system. But immediately a reaction takes place, which is assisted by the exercise of swimming, producing, even in water of a low temperature, an agreeable warmth. The stay in the water should never be prolonged beyond the period of that reaction. If the weather be left while the warmth continues, and the body immediately dried, the healthful glow over the whole surface will be delightful.

To remain in the water after the first reaction is over produces a prolonged chilliness, a shrinking of the flesh, and a collection of the blood to the internal parts of health and enjoyment; for it is only in water strongly impregnated with some mineral forms, where any bathe for many hours with impunity.

Certain precautions are necessary. Moderate exercise, by accustoming the skin to the powers of the water, and quickening the circulation, is better than inactivity. We should never go into the water immediately after a meal, nor while the process of digestion is going forward. Nor should we plunge into the water when violently heated or in a state of profuse perspiration. Both circumstances are often fatal, especially if the water be unusually cold. If too warm, the temperature of the body may be reduced by taking the metal and wetting the head.

Bathe in water rather than after, and especially before breakfast and before supper, are the proper seasons for bathing. The bath of the day ever to be selected is not in very hot weather a bath as useful to cool the blood and secure a refreshing sleep. If, in the middle of the day, a shaded place should be chosen, or the head protected from the sun's rays by hat or cap, or by a parasol, or, as is practiced by the fashionable French ladies at their watering places.

The sea is the best place for swimming. Owing to the greater specific gravity of salt water than fresh, the body is more buoyant in it, as are other substances. A high temperature of salt water does not produce such a relaxing effect. The difference is nearly equal to the weight of a stone in an adult.

The bathing machine of hard wood, gravel or smooth stones. Sharp stones and rocks should be avoided, as many strange accidents have occurred to avoid bruising cuts and quicksand. The new beginner should bear in mind that the water does not support the body so much as the current cannot carry him into a deeper place; also that there is no gain in the attempt to do this, as we are ever liable to accidents, cramps, etc., it is always best that bone of these should be accompanied by those who are older than themselves, and who will be able to save them in any emergency.

THE popular play of "Paul Pry," was suggested to Poole, the dramatist, by a circumstance which he has himself related:

"An idle old lady, living in a narrow street, had passed a number of days in watching the actions of her neighbors, that she at length acquired the power of distinguishing the knock of every known person living. It happened that she fell ill and was for several days confined to bed. Her curiosity prompted her to ask what was going on without, she stationed her maid at the window, and sent her out for the performance of this duty. But fatty soon grew weary of that occupation; she became careless in her reports, inventing stories for when reprimanded for her negligence.

"'Betty, what are you chatting about? Don't you hear a single knock at No. 8? Who is it?'

"'The boy from the pastry, ma'am.'

"'Betty, Betty, I declare I must give you warning. Why don't you tell me what that knock is, by this time?'

"'Why, lor, it's only the baker with pies.'

"'Pies again, Betty! Where's your wits gone at 54? They had pies yesterday!'

To Mr. Jonathan Hastings, of Cambridge, is ascribed the origin of the term Yankee, or colonists or Southern soil in 1713. In order to express crookedness—as, "Yankee good boy," or, "Yankee good order"—the students of Harvard soon caught and used it as a term of reproach.

THE peach was originally a poisonous almond. Its fleshy pulp was pressed by police screws, and is now for this purpose introduced into Paris. The transplantations and culture, however, not only improved its poisonous qualities, but produced the delicious fruit that we now enjoy.

A VERY delicate oil, much used in Russian cookery, is expressed from the seeds of the sunflower, and is prepared by simply steeping them in lees and pressing them in warm water; after which the oil is expressed. It is said to be as sweet as butter.

On the 14th of April, Orsini, Charlotte Corday, Ravaillac and Booth committed their crimes; and William the Silent, George I., George II., George III., George IV., William IV., Washington, President Lincoln and others, died out on a Saturday.

OFFICIAL returns lately issued, show the rate at which cotton cultivation increased in the South of Great Britain, in the year 1852, a living child was born to every 28 persons. In Prince (1851), only one child to every 27 persons; Anstola (1852), one to every 25; Fraisia (1850), one to every 32; Belgium (1851), one to every 30; Swedan (1851), one to every 22; Denmark and the Duchies (1851), one to every 27; Bavaria (1851), one to every 29; Hanover (1851), one to every 31; Spain and Balearic Islands (1851), one to every 28; Greece (1850), one to every 35; Chili (1852), one to every 24.

I AM so hairy from the railroad crash of that week I can hardly stand," said a blasting, bellowing chap.

"Well, then, I hope you intend to sue for damages," said his friend, sympathetically.

"Damages! no, no; I have had damages enough by them. If I sue for anything it will be for repairs."

A FRENCH author recently returned from Washington, in reply to a question as to where he had been, replied:

"I have been after an, and got the refusal of it."

A FRENCH author has lately said that the women in France are much shaven to fashion, that if the Empress should decree that they should go without clothes this summer, they would blush—to find themselves dressed.

A STORY OF ABSORBING INTEREST.
LOVE AND PRIDE.
A NOVEL,
BY MRS. A. BLEY.
"A story of more absorbing interest, characters drawn more to the life, more stirring incidents and amusing details it is seldom, if ever, been presented in the works of a novelist. The whole career of Augustus Hardress Bruce is a marvel of clever impudence, as that of Stanley Carvish is of good, diabolical villany, while the heroine's is a noble and beautiful portraiture. The plot is worked out with consummate skill, and every chapter increases the interest, until the work ends in artistic and happy climax."—London Times.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN,

THIRD SERIES.

$230,000,000!

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the Third Series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the Seven-Thirty Loan.

These Notes are issued under date of July 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that date, in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per cent.

GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County or Municipal taxation. They are the best one to three per cent. interest per annum, to their value, according to the rate from which they are taken. The interest is payable semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker. The interest at 7-30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Five cents " " " $100 "
Ten " " " $200 "
20 " " " $1,000 "
$1 " " " $5,000 "

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties issued, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of payment of interest in gold coin at the rate named of 7-3-tenths in currency. Subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15th, at the time when the notes are issued.

The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-Thirties will commence on or after that date. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest at the highest rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, will produce and equalize prices, that interest made with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to interest made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is now offered by the Government, and its superior advantages will make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $200,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. "A Little Story."

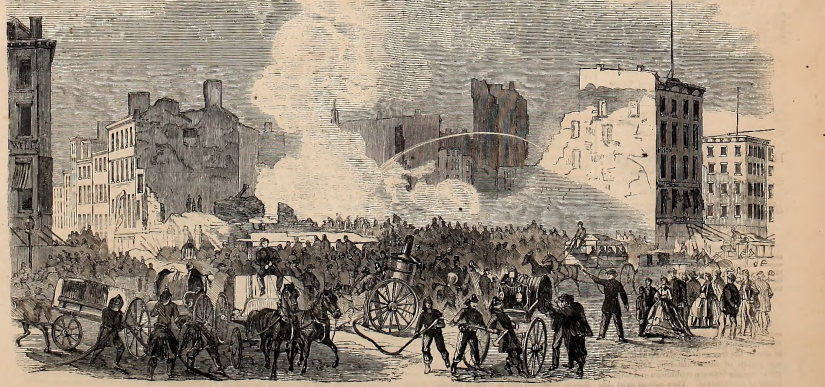
NEARLY every person who was ever thrown into personal relations with our late President, for however brief a time, has some story to relate, illustrative of the shrewd sense, and quick and homely, but always apt humor of that remarkable man. The writer of this may add one to the list of "little stories," of which the President was "reminded." It will be remembered that among the many projects and schemes that were suggested in response to the, as time has shown, unnecessarily anxious inquiry, "What shall we do with the contrabands?" there was one which, strangely enough, got a lodgment in the usually sagacious brain of Mr. Lincoln, namely, that of colonizing them in the West Indies, Central and South America, and elsewhere, just as though the great want of the country were not labor. The writer of this combated, in the columns of the Washington papers, the suicidal policy of sending labor, which is latent wealth, out of the country; but maintained that if the government was bent on such a policy at all, it should send the freedmen to some place where their labor would be so directed as to react on the United States, and so as to secure for ourselves, as factors and merchants, the secondary benefits of contraband industry, which would not be the case if the negroes were sent to any of the English, French or Spanish islands, or to South America. It was suggested that if sent anywhere, it should be to the Bay Islands, on the coast of Honduras, now occupied in part by an industrious community of liberated slaves, speaking English, and professing the same religion with our own, besides being accustomed to similar laws. The conditions for the success of a colonization experiment were there the most favorable.



The articles on this subject attracted the attention of the President, who invited their author to a personal interview. He called at the appointed time at the White House, and was admitted at once to the President's cabinet. It was winter; a wood fire blazed on the hearth and made the room cheerful. Mr. Lincoln was sitting before his table, in his shirt-sleeves and slippers, and his face wore its kindest and most genial expression in the ruddy firelight.

"Ah," said he, as his visitor entered, "lay you there!"—putting a weight upon a mass of papers lying before him, and wheeling his chair toward the fire. "Now we'll have a talk about that novel subject, the negro! You have been out to the Bay Islands, and know all about that Central American country?"

"Well, yes; if a residence of some years, many hundreds of leagues of travel, and the expenditure, and I may add the loss of a good many thousands of dollars there, can give knowledge!"

"And so you want I should send my colored babes out there? That reminds me of the fellow out west, a looker-on at a game of faro. He was constantly urging the player in front of him, albeit a perfect stranger, to 'bet on the ace.' 'Stranger, I tell you go it on the ace!' After a while the 'stranger' addressed turned sharply, and asked, 'Why the d——l should I go it on the ace?' 'Because,' was the reply of the outsider, 'because I bet on it all last night, and lost every red I had in the world. It must win soon!' So, as you say, you lost on your Central American ace, and you want I should go my pile on it. Perhaps I might do worse!" and he broke into one of his cheeriest laughs. "However, let us look into it. First let me have a map, for I am not very strong on the geographics."

I may add that the colonization crotchet, after one or two wretched failures in the attempt to carry it out, was finally worked out of the President's head.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold

Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received to it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of The Chimney Corner was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

The Chimney Corner is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

France and the United States.

The people are growing restive under the continued French occupation of Mexico. The "irrepressible conflict" between two systems of labor—the free and the slave—which would not permit of their existence, side by side, exists equally between republican and imperial forms of government. They cannot exist side by side. It will not do to point to Switzerland as an instance to the contrary. Switzerland is only a little community of simple, hard-working people, without the desire or power of expansion, with little commerce, without ports, and too weak to menace its neighbors, or extend its system of government, and exists rather through the rivalry of surrounding powers, than through any inherent strength of its own. Besides, Switzerland has no real independence. She is obliged to submit to the dictations, often arbitrary and oppressive, of her powerful neighbors. The empire in Mexico, and the republic in the United States, are very different things from the empire in France, and the republic in Switzerland; so different as to justify the assertion with which we started, that they cannot exist side by side.

It is true the "Empire" has existed in Mexico for nearly a year; that is to say, it has held the capital, the port of Vera Cruz, and some other places. But it never has had undisputed authority in a single department; it never has been accepted by the Mexican people, or any considerable part of them, and it could not exist for a day, except through foreign intervention. Its existence is in violation of the very first principle of government, the consent of the government, and it is rendered offensive to its only important neighbor, by its open, unnecessary and impudent violation of the fundamental and most cherished principle in the continental policy of that neighbor—a policy early and fully set forth as essential to the peace and security of the United States, and as necessary for the safety of the republican system in America. It is rendered additionally offensive, from the fact that its establishment was attempted at the moment when the head and champion of the American system was involved in civil war, and unable to interpose its strong arm to prevent encroachment on the rights of its neighbor and ally, or to vindicate the principles it had always avowed, and to which it was devoted.

The civil war which thus absorbed the energies and occupied the resources of the country, has now been ended for fully three months, and the people of the United States think that time enough has elapsed for the French Emperor to see that his project of a Mexican empire—which it is impossible to believe him to have conceived, except on the hypothesis of a divided Union—cannot be carried out. They have waited patiently, and with confidence, to see him take the preliminary steps to withdraw a useless and expensive, as well as unjust and offensive intervention, and have been content to do and say nothing which should embarrass that most necessary step, by wounding the pride, or exciting the passions of France. They have thought that a withdrawal of the French forces was so obviously a measure of sound policy, that Louis Napoleon could not hesitate one moment in shaping his conduct accordingly; and their previous high opinion of his statesmanship and foresight has been greatly lowered by his persistance in a measure wrong in its inception, and beset with dangers, even to the permanence of his dynasty.

As we said at the outset, the people of the United States are growing exceedingly restive under this state of things, and they begin to fear that the Emperor is not well or properly informed of their sentiments in the matter, by those who should fairly and fully make known to him the popular sentiment, and the determined policy and purposes of the country. The Department of State is the prescribed organ of communication between the United States and foreign governments, and the American people fear that it has been remiss in its duties; that the anxiety to avoid foreign complications, which was so obviously its duty during the period of our troubles, is too likely to become chronic and to degenerate into a timidity not shared by the people, and which will be sure to invite insult, and lead to wars that a more decisive and emphatic policy would be just as sure to prevent. This fear is becoming general, and notwithstanding the public disposition to consider the circumstances that have embarrassed the operations of the State Department, and have so sadly interfered with the discharge of the duties of its venerable and respected head, there is, nevertheless, much uneasiness in the popular mind, and great anxiety for a distinct reassertion of the policy of the government as regards foreign intervention in the domestic affairs of this continent. The people think it is only fair and just that the Emperor Napoleon should be authoritatively informed that the policy enunciated by Monroe, is a part of the political religion of this country, consecrated by tradition, sanctified by the judgment, and woven into the texture of the hearts of the American people. There is a conviction, wide spread, and with far too much foundation, that the French Government has not been properly impressed with the depth and universality of the popular devotion to the Monroe doctrine—that he has been led, by our representatives abroad, under the inspiration, or through the neglect of the State Department, to regard it as one of those "glittering generalities," or pompous nothings, designed only to "catch the ears of the groundlings," and not having, or designed to have, any practical value or application. We hope there has been no mistaken retience in this matter—no equivocation which will justify the Emperor in saying, when the issue of war shall come—as it will come if he persists in his Mexican madness—that he was misled in his persistence by the tacit consent of our government, and that the issue was the result of our lack of frankness and good faith.

It is true we may point to the unanimous vote of the late House of Representatives, and the unanimous action of the Senate, to say nothing of the equally unanimous expressions of the American press, to show that the nation is thoroughly devoted to the Monroe doctrine, and thoroughly hostile to the empire and French interference in Mexico, even to the extent of a war for the vindication of the first, and the extinction of the latter. To this, however, we may have the reply: "I am not called upon to interpret expressions of popular feeling in the United States; I only know its policy through the organs designated to express the policy of the nation. From these I learn that the votes in Congress are inconsequent; that popular expressions do not influence or compromise the government, and I have acted on these authoritative expositions."

Justice and prudence equally demand that we shall not put ourselves in this false position. The Monroe Doctrine must and will be asserted by arms if necessary. The French must evacuate Mexico, by force, if requisite. It is utterly impossible for an imperial government, supported by foreign bayonets to exist on our borders; it would be hardly less possible, even if it had the consent of the people over whom it is established. We can have no peace, or solid assurance of peace, while such a political mooncalf lies by our side. We cannot harmonize or act in concert with it. As long as its pestilent presence is there, we can have no assurance of quiet or order on our frontier. Its existence, speaking in the narrowest material sense, and leaving all principles aside, will be a constant source of annoyance, apprehension and expense. It will involve frontier forts and frontier armies, and the necessity of a large and costly navy ready for an emergency which our insecure relations with France may demand.

Such are the feelings, and such the judgment of the American people, and they are finding rapid and peremptory expression through the representative men of the nation. The voice raised by Gen. Wallace, Winter Davis, Montgomery Blair, and Secretary Harlan, finds an echo and response in the American heart far out of proportion to the importance of those individuals. It will be well if the government also respond in time to the popular demand, and before their voice shall demand upon every stump in the land and through their representatives in the next Congress, in a tone of thunder, the assertion of the Monroe Doctrine, and the extinction of the so-called Mexican Empire.

The "Monroe Doctrine."

We have elsewhere, in this issue, commented on the question of the revindication of the Monroe Doctrine, which is second only to the question of "reconstruction" of the Southern states, in popular interest and real importance. In a recent speech, the gallant general, Lew. Wallace, came out with a clear and soldier-like exposition of his views on this momentous question, which fairly express the sentiments of our veteran soldiery, North and South. Winter Davis, the distinguished and eloquent representative from Maryland, in Congress, has also spoken in the spirit of the resolution on this subject, carried by him unanimously through the National House of Representatives during its late session. Montgomery Blair, Mr. Lincoln's Postmaster-General, has also come out with an able exposition of this vital principle of our national policy, which is only marred by some unnecessary personalities bearing on our Secretary of State. He has been followed by Mr. Harlan, actual Secretary of the Interior, who is understood to be in perfect accord with President Johnson.

We give below the extracts from Mr. Monroe's Message to Congress in 1823, which formulized the great American doctrine which bears his name, and also some passages from the speeches of some of the gentlemen above referred to, which will command the attention of our readers at this juncture.

Mr. Monroe to Congress:

"Of events in that quarter of the globe [Europe] with which we have so much intercourse and from which we derive our origin, we have always been anxious and interested spectators. The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow men on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European Powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defence. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied Powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defence of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those Powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European Power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

Montgomery Blair, July 12.

"It is necessary, to prevent war, that the French emperor should be no longer deceived as to the feelings of the American people in regard to his position there. We need not say what we are able to do. He has seen that we are able to hold the territory which our forefathers bequeathed us. We should make it manifest, also, in a becoming manner, that we mean to maintain the government which they framed for us, and the principles which they asserted as necessary to preserve it—asserted, too, when they were comparatively a feeble power, in defiance of the allied powers of the whole continent of Europe. * * * * Cowardice, it should be remembered, invites oppression, because it falls an easy prey. Courage averts war, because it makes peace the interest of an enemy. Remember that the rebellion itself, suppressed without bloodshed by the courage of Andrew Jackson, was fostered into war by the cowardice of James Buchanan. Fortunately, we have at the head of our government a man of courage, judgment and constancy, and of patriotism, whom we may well hope neither the fear of France, nor the corruption of stockholders and jobbers, nor the blandishments of political aspirants, nor their party machinery, can swerve from the maintenance of the long-settled, well-approved policy of his country."

Mr. Harlan, Secretary of the Interior, July 14.

"When the French, not now friendly to our prosperity, sprang to arms in the defence of Turkish nationality, we all applauded; but when they attempt to crush feeble Mexico, we despise their want of generous gallantry, and wish it might be the will of God, in the order of his providence, that this great republic of ours should be called upon to protect her feeble sister republic."

The annual hideous slaughter of dogs is now going on in this city. There is here an "institution" called a dog-pound, whither all stray dogs that have been "comprehended," as Dogberry would say, during the day, are taken. If reclaimed before 4 P. M., no harm happens to them, and if not reclaimed, but belonging to the "upper ten thousand" of dogs, they are spared and sold. The common herd of unreclaimed dogs, however, are at 4 P. M. each day thrust into empty vats, shut in, and then inundated with water from the hose, so that they drown miserably in the dark. Three hundred a day are sometimes thus systematically destroyed, under the influence of the superstitious alarm produced by the absurd name of "dog-days." It is a well-known fact, we believe, that hydrophobia in dogs, is commoner in winter than summer. Yet here are 300 orphan dogs daily immolated, and 300 bereaved masters or mistresses pierced to the heart, for a silly illusion that has been unfortunate enough to get itself embalmed in our language. If Anglo Saxons, in a future state of existence, should inhabit the dog star, we suppose they would pass a dog law, like the Black law so recently repealed in Illinois, excluding all dogs on pain of death. Dog-days in the dog star, with even a live puppy capable of hydrophobia, no Anglo Saxon would be cynic enough to face.

The German Princes are dreadfully troubled by a new demand from the American Government, which is said to be very strongly pressed. German emigrants usually choose as their date of departure, the year before their turn comes to submit to conscription, but if they ever go back, the governments catch them, and make them try their chance again. The Washington Government, which regards them as naturalized citizens, considers this an oppression, and requests the princes either to repeal the law or abstain from putting it into force. The princes, embarrassed by the extreme popularity of the North in Germany, would comply but they say compliance would enormously increase an emigration which already alarms them; they will probably contrive to comply secretly, but the attractive force of America is becoming an important element in European politics. It keeps up a process of evaporation so rapid, that th reservoirs cannot remain full.

There are some remains of the old sun or fire worship in Ireland. The custom of lighting a fire and dancing around it, on certain anniversaries, is only one of the ceremonies of the worship of Baal or Moloch perpetuated. The Bible tells us how the Philistines passed their children through the fire, "to Moloch." In the town of Annaghmore, in Ulster, Ireland, the Catholics have a custom of lighting great bonfires and dancing round them, while their children leap through the flame. The people think this a highly Christian ceremony, and perform it on St. John's Eve, but there seems evidence that the custom was derived from the Phœnicians, and is a relic of of the worship of Moloch. However that may be, the Orangemen think it a capital opportunity for jeering, and on the last 23d of July a group of Protestant lads marched towards the dancers. Of course the latter instantly shrieked, "To hell with King William!" and rushed at the Protestants, who equally of course shouted, "To hell with the Pope!" and broke all the heads they could. Both parties being equally successful in that amusement, grew tired, and the Catholics being armed poured in a sharp fire, wounding seven of their opponents. The Catholics fled, the victors were arrested, and it is a matter of of chance whether the jury will find a verdict of attempted murder or honorable self-defence. Do we really live in the first decade of the last half of the 19th century?

A Newbern (N. C.) correspondent writes:

"Newbern is a queer place. The African element seems to be largely predominant, but the whites are quite numerous and all seem to be equally lazy. From early morning until far into the night the streets are thronged with vagabonds and idlers of all colors and of both sexes, who make it their sole business not to do anything. They are called "refugees." They have been drawn hither by the attraction of free provender from Uncle Sam's crib; and I was informed that until the first of the present month 15,000 rations was the daily dole afforded by the post quartermaster, thus to encourage and stimulate idleness, licentiousness and all the worst vices of the social state."

AMONG all irrational schemes is that recently concocted between a representation of Canadians and the British Government for what is called the "Defences of Canada." Canada is to build certain fortifications, the Home Government is to guarantee the loans necessary to that end, and arm them when built. There are some railways to be built, not where trade and travel require them, but to meet military ends. Altogether some large sums of money are to be spent for military works which will be of no earthly use against the only nation with which Canada is ever likely to be embroiled, the United States. In case of a war between this country and Great Britain, Canada would probably do as Yucatan did, during the Mexican war. Lying away from the vital points of Mexico, and where the operations of war could have no important effect in deciding the contest, that state entered into an arrangement by which she agreed to maintain a neutral position, as an equivalent for being exempted from attack. Canada could not act otherwise except at the risk of being over-run and conquered—a result that would poorly compensate her for over-zealous devotion to the mother country. Recent events show well enough that all the fortifications that Canada could build in a half century would be a flimsy protection against invasion from the United States. There never can be a cause of difference between us and the hyperboreans, more serious than that occasioned by their inability or indisposition to preserve their neutrality during the late war. If there were a prospect of a renewed experience of the same sort, it would be our duty to take possession of the Canadas and hold them, in spite of their "defences." As it is, all we want is fair trade with them, and that they do not make themselves unnecessarily disagreeable.

ONE of the evils of the railway carriages of England—which are built in small compartments to suit the British idea of exclusiveness—is the facility which they afford designing females to trump up charges of "assault" or "indecent familiarity" against male passengers who may be unfortunate enough to occupy the same compartment with them alone. This evil has become so flagrant, that we are told, in a parliamentary report, that "gentlemen passengers, as well as railway officers of all classes, constantly refuse to travel singly with a stranger of the weaker sex, under the belief that it is only common prudence to avoid, in this manner, all risk of being accused—for purposes of extortion—of insult or assault." On this, a leading English journal remarks that, "a good deal of alarm has been excited among respectable males of late, by the mania that has seized the other sex for imagining or asserting that they have been criminally assaulted upon railways;" it adds, "it has become a perfect mania," and it proceeds to enumerate a number of instances where such charges have been made by females, that have been proved to be utterly without foundation—the persons accused in one or two cases having been far away at the time alleged. The philosophic deduction of the journal in question is, that there are certain manias which attack the susceptible and impressible female mind at intervals, sometimes taking a religious, and sometimes a demoniac form, and that this tendency to false accusation of assault in railway carriages is one of them. It proceeds:

"It is one of the most cruel features of this class of charges that the ordinary presumption of law is practically reversed in respect to them. Unless innocence is positively made out, guilt is inferred. Juries make it a point of principle always to believe the woman, and they are careful to avoid any risk of tampering with their principles, or confusing their minds, by listening to evidence. Some of the magistrates seem to look upon perjury of this kind, even when it is decisively proved, as a weakness of lovely woman which rather exalts than diminishes her charms. So that the accused, on such a complaint, is in evil case. Virtually he is called upon to prove a negative—to show that that which a woman asserts to have taken place at a given time, did not take place. If he fails, the chances are that he is absolutely lost. A soldier, or sailor, or an M. P. for a populous borough, might recover from such a conviction, with no worse damage than a standing joke against him. But a solicitor, a barrister, a medical man or a clergyman, would be irrecoverably ruined. Yet, according to the practice of magistrates and juries, it is of no avail for him to pit his word against the woman's. Practically, the presumption of law in this case is that the man is guilty, unless he is proved to be innocent. It is worth while to examine the ideas upon which this curious perversion of justice rests."

So far as this evil is connected with railway traveling in England, it might be easily remedied by the introduction of the carriages used on our railways, where the passengers occupy large saloons, and where "the privacy" of the English carriage, out of which the evil springs, is impossible. Englishmen will have to become gregarious, give up their fine ideas of exclusiveness, if only to escape the persecutions of their fair, too susceptible, and not over scrupulous wives, sisters and daughters!

Apropos of the very silly Copperhead affectations of horror over the execution of Mrs. Surratt, we copy the following sensible paragraph from the N. Y. Herald:

"One notable question is settled by this execution—a woman can be hanged when justice requires it. The laws against crime do not discriminate between the sexes; but public opinion does. No good reason can be given why a bad woman should be spared where a bad man should die; but a sentimental notion does not stand upon reasons, and it seemed possible that such a notion might have a favorable effect on Mrs. Surratt's fate. It is a healthy sign when the law cannot be swayed from its straight course by such means."

LET any considerable number of Englishmen get interested in a claim, à la Don Pacifico or otherwise, and the British Lion will be "around" as collector—a business just suited to his modern character. In view of this tendency of the emasculated brute, a Paris correspondent of the Tribune suggests that the holders of claims against the British government, on account of Alabama and other Anglo-rebel outrages, shall interest Englishmen and Frenchmen with them. He says:

"If I were manager of the company having charge of the collection of these claims I would have a certain number of the shares sold or otherwise distributed in London or Paris. I can imagine that a little interest in the matter, made in that way, might expedite the settlement. If there were no other way, I can imagine the government quietly buying up the whole claim, taking care to first bluster a little to lower its market price, and get a good bargain. But I do not need to suggest to either diplomatists or financiers, how these things may be managed."

THE London Saturday Review hits off, in a few but pregnant words, the radical weakness of the Imperial system in France. It observes that "dynastic succession does not necessarily follow from the premises of the Imperial or Napoleonic system. "The Imperial theory is that Ministerial responsibility to the Chambers is a delusion. The Cabinet is responsible to the Emperor alone, and the Emperor is responsible to none except the nation. But the French constitution provides no way for the nation to show its dissatisfaction with its great representative. They can only revolt if they do not like him."

BOOK NOTICES, ETC.

HUGH WORTHINGTON. A Novel. By MRS. MARY J. HOLMES, Author of "Darkness and Daylight," etc. New York: Carleton.

Among the writers of modern fiction, to whom the public is indebted for its mental recreation, Mrs. Holmes occupies a distinguished position. At once a fascinating writer, and a clever constructionist, she has the power of holding the affections of her readers, and of strengthening their moral resolves. In the work before us she has drawn an admirable picture of a Kentucky home, so truthful as to bring the very scene before us, while the character of Hugh Worthington is depicted with great breadth and vividness. This volume is well calculated to carry down to the seaside or Saratoga, as instruction is well blended in this excellent story.

LOVE AND PRIDE. By MRS. GRAY. New York: F. A. Brady.

Among the many novels published lately, few will be found more interesting than this new work, by this well-known writer. The plot of the story is well laid, the scenes are fresh, and the characters life-like; in a word, the reader's attention is kept fixed to the close of the volume.

TOWN GOSSIP.

THE Atlantic telegraph is now becoming one of the prominent topics of the time, and business men are beginning to think that the tariff is rather high. It has certainly thrown a damp upon young ladies who wished to correspond with their lovers on the other side of the Atlantic. Merchants of wealth must economise their words, since five dollars a word seems like another version of the saying, that "silence is golden!" at all events, speaking is only obtained at a great golden outlay. Whether this will work any change upon the garrulous nature of the age, we cannot say; certainly, when a man cannot open his mouth to a friend in Europe, without having to pay so heavily for it, it will make every man weigh his words before he invests so much capital in them. It cannot, therefore, fail to bring the monosyllabic style of eloquence into fashion. As Shakespeare is credited with prophecying the cable, in Puck's boast—

"I'll put a girdle round the earth in forty minutes!"

we may, also, claim for him the merit of foretelling what a very high tariff the directors would charge for every word, in his no less famous apothegm of "Brevity's the soul of wit," which is just thirty dollars worth of sound it sent across the wires.

The saddest topic of the week, is the destruction, by fire, of that renowned institution, Barnum's Museum. Old Sam Johnson said, "When Garrick died, the gaiety of nations was eclipsed," and we may also say, that the destruction of the Museum is a great damper to the rising young for the present. Some gloomy, morose fellows, who boast that they were never in Barnum's in their life, are of the same race that Shakespeare says, "are fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils; let no such men be trusted," they are living groans, and not men. There are very few who do not feel its loss as a great domestic calamity. Here, for a generation, Americans of all ages and sizes have been accustomed to take their families and country friends, to the latter of whom it will be especially a deprivation, since it was the first place they cared to visit. Even grave men of business, when they heard what was burning, paused in their bargains in gold, petroleum and cotton, to muse upon the many sensations they had received from this great electrical machine, where novelties were administered in as many healthy shocks, to both youthful or wearied systems. Here all that was strange, and contradictory in nature, were to be found in striking juxtaposition—the smallest man in the world stood beside the tallest woman living—certainly Miss Anna Swan might have put Tom Thumb into her pocket, leaving a state room for Mrs. Tom Thumb, and that interesting little Thumb. "What is it?" and Circassian princesses, here were to be seen, and a world of wonders, opened to all. As far as zoology and natural history are concerned, we question if Barnum has not done more to teach our rising generation than a dozen professors. But all has gone like a dream. To use the poetical diction of our rising poets:

The fire-king came,
And with his tongue of flame,
Licked the old spot, and it was—
But in name.

Apropos of the descriptions given by those industrious and reliable historians, the reporters, who henceforth should be called masters of fiction, what can equal the stirring account of deadly combats waged by roasting lions, tigers, Anna Swans—we should say anacondas—bears, alligators, and other menagerial animals? The most reliable story of the kind that we have heard is, that a gentleman of the press, who, like Jonah, was very fond of fish, had been detected in pocketing the smallest of the whales!

So much for the past of Barnum. Now for the future. Already he is arranging for a new museum, which will throw the old one into the shade—from the ashes of this burnt phœnix a nobler one will rise.

The theatrical novelty of the week has been the production of one of those nondescript things called Hibernian dramas, and enjoying the ultra Irish title of "Arrah na Pogue," which is not so intelligible as "Arrah me Brogue." It is by the modern Beaumont and Fletcher of the drama, Boucicault and House, and has been judiciously advertised in a lawsuit as to copyright. We congratulate the Siamese twins of playwrightdom upon the success of their united efforts, for, owing to excellent scenery, excellent acting and excellent construction, it was a decided one. Indeed, so much so, that a leading daily paper had to employ an additional dramatic critic to chronicle its triumph.

Miss Kate Reignolds still attracts at the Broadway, and the Wallack and Davenport combination draws good houses, despite summer weather and waterside attractions.

So much for the present amusements. In the future, we are promised, early in October, John Brougham, who is engaged to perform at the Winter Garden for a limited number of nights, before appearing in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, &c. In September, Herman, the renowned prestidigitateur, will make his appearance at the Academy of Music, with a number of new illusions, the result of his European researches. Mr. Herman says that every one of the tricks he will then perform will be entirely new in this country—in point of fact, astonishers and novelties.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Owing to the liberation of prisoners and the discharge of the army, the number of applications for pensions in the month of June was greater than ever before. Since the war began 84,000 pensions have been issued—34,000 to invalid soldiers, and 50,000 to widows, mothers and minor children. The payments to pensioners the past year have amounted to $9,000,000, and when all pensions arising from the war shall have been granted, the annual expenditure will be about $13,000,000.

—— A horse stealer, on his way to the Iowa state prison, while on a steamboat, threw his manacled hands over the neck of the man who was guarding him, and making a desperate leap forward, threw himself and the man into the river. Both were drowned.

—— A woman was hung on Boston Common about 70 years ago. Her crime consisted of snatching a bonnet and reticule from a lady, on one of the streets leading from Fort Hill. She was indicted for highway robbery, and convicted, and suffered the extreme penalty of the law.

—— A fearful accident happened on the 4th inst., on the steamer Ottawa, while making a pleasure excursion on Lake Erie. Part of the machinery on the main deck, protruding about eight inches, caught in its revolutions the dress of a lady, who in her fright caught hold of another, who seized a third. The result was that the three unhappy ladies were wound round the shaft, and before any aid could be rendered, were crushed to death.

—— A very valuable silver mine has been discovered about 50 miles west of Denver City.

—— Two most destructive fires broke out almost simultaneously on the 13th inst. The first and most extensive commenced at Barnum's Museum, and raged till twelve stores, comprising almost the entire block, from Ann street to Fulton, were completely destroyed. The other was in West 44th street, between 9th and 10th avenues, and left over 70 families without homes.

—— The bonded warehouse of Mr. Bowlett, Jamestown, Ill., containing 2,500 barrels of whiskey, was struck by lightning on the 8th inst., and consumed.

—— The Attorney General says that the President has not the power to appoint a commissioner to decide upon the cotton claims of Savanna, Mobile, Charleston, etc.

—— The Richmond Whig has been suppressed by the military authorities for the treasonable character of its articles. Among other offensive things, it declared the confiscation law to be "mean, brutal and cowardly."

—— The Connecticut Legislature has just passed a bill, compelling railroads in that state not to abolish the commutation system, nor to increase the rate of commuters' fares in a greater ratio than the increased way fares as they were July 1. Mr. Barnum made a most excellent speech on the occasion, putting the whole matter in its practical shape.

—— The Superintendent of Freedmen, at Shreveport, La., has told the planters that they will not be allowed to drive their aged, helpless and infirm slaves from their plantations, as now practiced by them.

—— Chief Justice Chase, after his tour in the South, is now visiting his daughter, Mrs. Sprague, of Rhode Island.

—— The Hudson River railroad charge $5,000 for the privilege of selling books and newspapers on the route. It is calculated that the passengers of each "through train" purchase a hundred dollars' worth of reading matter.

Foreign.—There has been no instance of the death of an heir to the Russian throne since 1233, when Prince Theodore was cut off just as preparations were being made for his marriage.

—— The Aftonbladet of Stockholm, in a striking article on European emigration in the 19th century, says that Germany sent 1,500,000 of emigrants to the United States between 1840 and 1860.

—— The Bishop of Nimes has just published a pastoral letter, commanding prayers to be offered up for the cessation of the malady affecting the silkworms in his own and surrounding dioceses.

—— The Viceroy of Egypt is said to be in a state of nervous depression which excites the gravest apprehensions. He is afraid of assassination or poisoning. He sees scarcely anybody but his mother and sister. His mother cooks for him, and brings his coffee in a locked coffee-pot.

—— A young bride on her way to church, accidentally discovering that her intended wore a wig, reproached him for deception, turned back, and nothing could induce her to marry him.

—— The British Parliament was dissolved on the 6th of July, and a general election is raging throughout Great Britain and Ireland. A riot has taken place at Nottingham, which required the aid of the military to quell it, the police being unequal to the task.

—— It is said that the Prince of Wales won $50,000 at the recent Epsom races.

—— The London papers popularly known in England as the Mrs. Harris and Sairy Gamp, namely the Herald and Standard, recently created quite a panic in the stock exchange in Paris, by publishing an announcement that Mr. Seward had officially informed the French Minister at Washington that the United States never could acknowledge the Mexican empire.

—— A French paper says that on the 15th of April the Queen of Madagascar solemnly caused herself and daughters to be invested in crinoline, and officially declared it was only to be worn by the wife of her first minister.

THE Bordeaux journals state that the first pods of the vanilla plant that have ever ripened in France, or even in Europe, have just been gathered in the hot-houses of the public gardens of St. Bruno in that city. In quality they are superior to the vanilla of commerce, inasmuch as the latter, previously to being brought into the market, is subject to an operation for extracting part of its odoriferous pulp for perfumery. The vanilla plant grows so well in the above-named gardens that there is good reason to suppose that a considerable quantity will be produced next year.

IN Morocco, a criminal never knows his sentence, or the time and mode of carrying it out. To save his feelings, he may be shot dead at a moment when he is, perhaps, looking for liberty.

WOMEN IN THE OLDEN TIME.

THE Talmudists denied altogether that Eve was created out of the rib of Adam, assigning to her an origin infinitely less honorable. If we are to credit the Rabinical writers, the rib, after having been extracted from the side of the father of all living, was suffered to remain unused for a time, and excited the cupidity of a mischievous, malignant monkey, who watched his opportunity, snatched up the prize and hurried off with it at express speed. The angel, whose business it was to have watched the treasure, and who was unfortunately caught napping, hastened at a terrible pace in pursuit of the audacious thief, but in vain; the pilferer got clear off with his booty, leaving, however, his ungainly caudal appendage in the hard grasp of his pursuer: it was out of his tail, and not the Adamite rib, that, in the belief of the Jewish doctors, Eve was manufactured.

Few would like to trace up their pedigree to a monkey; still fewer to that ungainly member of his person to which the Talmudists referred the origin of Eve. The philosophers of antiquity, one and all, held woman in slender esteem; but it should be remembered that those who saw in her only a development of a fish, considered also that man, her hereditary lord and master, had himself also an ichthyo origin, and that his real progenitors were finny denizens of the great deep.

Heretics, in the early ages of the church, were found, who dogmatically denied to woman the possession of the attributes of humanity, and affirmed that in reality she was nothing better than a brute beast—having, like some brute beasts, such as the chimpanzee and the gorilla, a certain hideous resemblance to mankind, with whom she had really nothing else in common. Such prevalence did this monstrous doctrine acquire, that in the fifth century, a council of the church was summoned at Macon, in France, formally to condemn it and anathematize its supporters. But even in the council were divines to be found who gave to the abominable heresy a sort of qualified approval, contending, upon what grounds it is useless now to conjecture, that the salvation which came by the cross was limited to man alone, and that for woman Christ did not die. It was only after long and anxious debate, this pestilent dogma received its fitting censure.

St. Augustine's notions on the matter may be inferred from the singular opinion which he maintains in his famous treatise De Civitate Dei, where he contends that, at the resurrection, womankind will be wanting, but that all who rise will rise as males.

Aristotle, whom those misogynists the Jews used to claim as a Jew—an honor, we will undertake to say, he never thought of, and never would have desired—is still more severe on the sex. Women, in his belief, was a mistake altogether. She ought never to have been permitted to disgrace the earth with her presence. She was an incomplete, unfinished production altogether—a bungled piece of goods—a discredit to mankind amongst whom she was cast. She was worse than useless; she was positively mischievous. On certain days, if she was abroad, the atmosphere became tainted on her appearance, liquors became corrupted, the milk curdled, the cream acquired the flavor of verjuice, the melon withered, the mirror was sullied in reflecting her visage, sterility followed her footsteps, animals became mad on her approach, and the sight of her called forth a plentiful crop of snakes. Much of this rhodomontade certainly is due, not to Aristotle himself but to his followers; still, his hostility to woman is an ascertained fact, and his disciples only improved on the doctrine of their master.

Amauri, a famous doctor of Paris, who flourished at the beginning of the twelfth century, was of these disciples the most renowned, and drew down on himself the censure of the papal chair, then filled by Innocent III. His own bishop, scandalised at his heterodoxy, convoked a synod and summoned him to attend and receive the sentence it should pass on him; but Amauri died before the synod had concluded its deliberations. Resolved not wholly to be cheated of their prey, the assembled fathers decreed that the corpse of the scandaliser of woman should forthwith be exhumed, and publicly dragged, with every mark of indignity, through the principal streets of Paris—a decree which was executed in its fulness, greatly, no doubt, to the satisfaction of the fair Parisians, who must have felt their wrongs revenged, and their rightful position in the order of beings effectually vindicated by the extremely decorous proceeding. Amauri's death, and his post-mortem punishment, did not, however, put an end to his heresy. He left behind him numerous and devoted believers in his doctrines, and many of these, by order of the Council of Paris, were brought to the stake in 1210 and duly roasted alive, that men should know the fair sex was not to be depreciated with impunity.

HOW THE DUTCHMAN PAID A PROMISSORY NOTE.—There were two early settlers in the western part of Pennsylvania, whose names were Peter —— and John ——. Peter had increased the size of his farm by annexing to it a small tract of land adjoining, and he lacked about $100 of the sum which was necessary to pay for his new acquisition. He called on his neighbor John to borrow the amount. John consented at once, and, going into another room, he brought out an old bread-basket, and counted out the desired number of dollars, and then the two sat down to two large earthen mugs of cider, and as many pipes of tobacco. After smoking over the matter for a while, it occurred to Peter that in a similar transaction he had seen or heard of something like a note passing between the borrower and the lender, and he suggested as much to John. The lender assented to the propriety of such a course. Paper, pen and ink were produced, and between the two a document was concocted, stating that John had lent Peter $100, which Peter would repay to John in "tree monte." This Peter signed, and thus far the two financiers made the thing "all regular and ship-shape." But at this point a difficulty presented itself. They both knew that the notes were drawn in the operation of borrowing and lending, which they had witnessed, but neither of them had observed what disposition was made of the documents, neither could tell whether it was for the borrower or lender to take charge of the paper. Here was a dilemma. At last a bright thought struck John. "You have the money to pay, Peter, so you take dis paper so as you can see as you have to pay it." This was conclusive; the common sense of the thing was plain, and Peter pocketed his money and his note, "so as he could see that he had to pay it." Three months passed over, and to the day appeared Peter, and paid over the promised sum to John. This being done, the mugs and pipes were again brought out. After puffing awhile, Peter produced the note, and handed it to John, with the remark, "Now, John, you must take the note, so that you can see that the money has been paid."

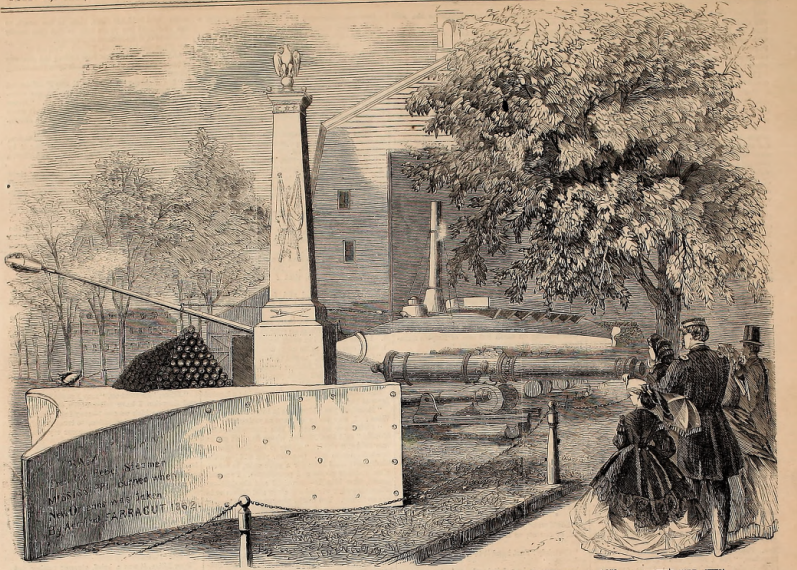
TILESIUS declares his belief that mammoth skeletons still left in Northern Russia exceed in number all the elephants now existing upon the globe. Doubtless the process of mammoth extinction was very gradual, and extended over an enormous space of time. This circumstance is indicated by the varying condition in which the tusks and teeth are found. Whereas the gelatine, or soft animal matter, of many specimens remains, impairing one of the characteristics necessary to the being of ivory, other specimens have lost this material, and mineral substances, infiltrating, have taken its place. The gem turquoise is pretty generally conceded to be nothing else than the fossilized tooth of some extinct animal—probably the mammoth. "Curiosity of speculation prompts the mind to imagine to itself the time when the last of these gigantic animals succumbed to influences that were finally destined to sweep them all from the earth. Had men come upon the scene when they roamed their native wilds? Were those wilds the same as now, as to climate and vegetable growths? Testimony is mute. Time silently unveils the sepulchred remains, leaving fancy to expatiate as she will on a topic wholly beyond the scope of mortal intelligence."

STRAWBERRIES.—Why are they called strawberries, is a question most people have asked about the ruddy fruit. The name is derived from a custom long ago prevalent in England, of the children stringing berries on straws of grass, and selling so many strings for a penny.

THE TROPICAL FRUIT TRADE—VESSELS UNLOADING THEIR CARGOES AT BURLING SLIP, NEW YORK.

THE TROPICAL FRUIT TRADE.

THE most ignorant have some knowledge of where bananas, oranges, lemons, cocoa-nuts, pine-apples and other tropical fruits grow, but how they are brought to New York city is a question not easily answered, unless it be said generally "they come by water." Hardly any person who has ever visited Fulton market in the summer season, has failed to observe the many quaint-looking craft lying alongside the docks, many of them apparently without nationality, and all of them looking exceedingly rakish. These are the vessels engaged in the tropical fruit trade. Some of these peculiar craft are represented to be wreckers from Nassau, Cuba, Windward islands, etc., and it is said, when their customary plunder proves short, they betake themselves to the fruit-growing districts, and load their vessels with bananas, pine-apples, cocoa-nuts, oranges and lemons. Loaded with a rich cargo of these luscious edibles, the vessels put for New York, or whatever port seems most desirable to them, and forthwith put themselves and their freight into the hands of commission merchants. These vessels trade along the South American coast, touching at Cuban and West Indian ports, including Kingston, Jamaica. Bananas mostly come from Baracoa, Ruatan and Matanzas; cocoa-nuts, from Brazil; pine-apples from Cuba, Matanzas and Nassau.



In Cuban fruits the trade is always lively, on account of the regularity of the supplies and the ready sale always found for such fruit. Havana oranges generally make their first appearance in November, and last through the winter until March. Limes also arrive in large quantities from Cuba, and form no inconsiderable part of the trade.

Baracoa bananas and cocoa-nuts have their season from March to July, when the Carthagenian fruit assumes full sway. Matanzas pine-apples last from May to July, and the Nassau fruit trade, the "sugar-loaf," comes in from May until the end of August.

Altogether, the tropical fruit trade is a curious and instructive study, both on account of the seeming mass of interesting information to be gained, and the almost insurmountable difficulty in obtaining it.

CHILD AND ANGEL.

THROUGH the amber gates of morning,
Sliding past the golden bars,
Came an angel in the dawning,
Downward from the land of stars.

Clad in robes of innocency,
Crowned with gleaming, golden hair;
Eyes that caught their light from heaven,
Face of beauty, fine and rare;

Voice that in the angel chorus
Sang before the throne of God;
Feet that, in the Eden garden,
By the living waters trod.

Now the wings were meekly folded,
And she walked the earth and smiled,
And we called her Maud, and knew her
For a gentle, winsome child.

Summers deepened into autumn,
Winters melted into spring,
While she toyed with birds and blossoms,
Loved and loving everything.

But her eyes looked ever upward,
With a waiting, wistful gaze,
And she pined, and paled, and sickened
Through the dreary winter days;

Living only in the summer,
Longing for the sun to shine,
Drinking in the scented breezes,
Quaffing life's delicious wine.

Oh, the fairest flowers and gayest
Ever bloomed beneath her feet,
And the birds before her casement
Seemed to sing more wildly sweet.

Earth spread out before her darling,
Fairest landscapes, bluest skies,
Did her homage, seemed to know her,
For an angel in disguise.

So she lived, and loved, and taught us
Lessons of divinest love,
Then the radiant wings unfolding
Bore our darling far above.

Through the ruby gates of even,
Sliding past the golden bars,
Fled a spirit in the sunset,
Upward to the land of stars.

Now again the choral angels
Give their sister welcome sweet,
And beside the living waters
Roam her unaccustomed feet;

But on earth we listen vainly
For the music of her tone,
Watch in vain to catch her footfall,
For our angel guest has flown.

Yet we hope again to meet her,
When the task of life is done,
Humbly hope that God will take us,
Through the merits of His Son;

Flinging wide the shining portals,
Throwing back the golden bars,
He will lead us to our darling,
Dwelling in the land of stars.

THE ACCUSATION.

Ellice Monille's Trial.

IT was the full noontide of a brilliant April day, with diamond rain-drops sparkling on the plate-glass windows of Mrs. Payson's boudoir, even while the sunshine wove itself in quivering arabesques of vivid gold around the stand of peerless white japonicas that occupied the niche between the heavy orange silk curtains. It was an elegant room, with cosy fauteuils and divans of canary-colored satin, like magnified sea-shells, and a carpet whose creamy velvet was strewn with clusters of deep blue forget-me-nots. All around were scattered the witnesses of a fashionable woman's hopeless ennui—the cabinet piano, open, yet deserted—the rosewood secrétaire containing a half-finished note (Mrs. Payson was too indolent ever to achieve a full-blown letter), the workbox piled with gaily colored wools and patterns; the French novel on the sofa. Poor Mrs. Payson! she worked a great deal harder to do nothing, than any day laborer toils, to win his two dollars a day!

THE DENOUEMENT.

Just at present, however, she had found a congenial and truly feminine occupation; she was absorbed in displaying her latest acquisitions in rich laces, to her niece, Miss Geneva Ware.

Mrs. Payson was a plump, languid matron, with pale blue eyes and fair, abundant hair, rolled back à la Eugenie from a face where plentiful applications of rouge and pearl-powder concealed the remains of a very delicate skin. Her dress was blue velvet, buttoned down the bodice, with tiny clusters of turquoise, and each plump wrist bore at least three heavy bracelets, twinkling with precious stones and tiny chains—for Mrs. Payson was fond of jewelry and seldom did violence to her inclinations in that respect, or any other!

Her companion was altogether different. Geneva Wade was a tall, sparely moulded girl, of about twenty-two, with large black blue eyes and hair that had the indescribable color and glimmer of melted gold—a young Juno in face and figure—while her beautiful complexion, just touched with the sentient pink on either cheek, might have shamed even the waxen whiteness of the japonicas in the window. She was dressed in an exquisitely fitting robe of lilac silk, whose folds, sweeping luxuriantly down from her slender waist, seemed to have caught the amethyst glow of tropic sunsets, while her ornaments—a set of delicate Italian cameos, circled with seed pearls—were in the most perfect taste.

"Oh, sanity, how perfect!" she exclaimed enthusiastically, holding up an infinitesimal web of creamy lace. "It's real Spanish point, isn't it? You might examine it with a microscope and find no flaw; the little beauty!"

Mrs. Payson smiled in gratified vanity.

"It ought to be pretty, Geneva. I gave two hundred and fifty dollars for it—but then it was the only one imported."

"Oh, you extravagant aunty!" laughed Geneva, giving her aunt quite a little shake with each word. "Two hundred and fifty dollars for a lace collar! Well, it's a delicious thing to be rich, isn't it?"

"I always prefer the very choicest and most expensive of everything," said the self-satisfied matron. "There's no pleasure in wearing these cheap, common things, such as other people buy. And really, Geneva, you know Spanish point is just like diamonds and Indian shawls—a safe investment, as your uncle says. "It's a positive heirloom; it never will wear out!"

"That's true," sighed Geneva, with something of envy in her softly modulated voice, as Mrs. Payson leaned forward to pull the silken bell-rope.

"Send Miss Monille here."

And Miss Monille came—a delicate, slenderly framed, little creature, with a crimson mouth and with heavy braids of glossy purple-black hair, and black eyes, full of liquid lights and shadows. She was a child indeed; for criminal as the excesses of her cheek glowed like wine, through a clear olive dark skin, and the simple low dress of ribbon at her throat was pretties, in its unostentatious grace than any flash of diamonds, or sparkle of bloody rubies.

"Monille, here!"

And Miss Monille came—a delicate, slenderly framed, little creature, with a crimson mouth and with heavy braids of glossy purple-black hair, and black eyes, full of liquid lights and shadows. She was a child indeed; for criminal as the excesses of her cheek glowed like wine, through a clear olive dark skin, and the simple low dress of ribbon at her throat was pretties, in its unostentatious grace than any flash of diamonds, or sparkle of bloody rubies.

"I hope I haven't taken your attention off the dear children's education, Miss Monille," said Mrs. Payson, sarcastically, playing with her bracelets, "but I really don't like to trust that rattle-brained Jenkinson with these expensive laces. Just take this piece of lace and the dressing-bureau drawer, won't you? and bring me the key!"

She held the laces back into their satin-wood box almost as tenderly as if they had been sentient, human things, and gave it to Miss Monille, who glided out of the room as quietly as she had entered it.

"Is that your present governess, aunt?" questioned Miss Geneva, carelessly hiding a yawn behind her pretty hand. "The last time I visited you, there was a pretty English-looking, but spectacles and dyed silks, queening it over the school-room; and this, I suppose is her successor?"

"Yes—isn't she a pretty little creature? So quiet, too—it absolutely rests one to hear her moving across the room. Ralph always declares she makes him think of the pomegranate blossoms in the conservatory; he says she is perfectly tropical!"

"Does he?"

Geneva looked thoughtfully into the red glow of the grate, turning her bracelet of rare Italian cameos round and round upon her wrist. And when Ellice Monille began to bring the lace, she shrank, without knowing why, from the blue hateful fire that seemed to scorch her, as Geneva Ware's handsome eyes rested an instant upon her face.

"So we are rivals!" pondered Geneva, biting her lip. "I suppose I have not beheld one of these years to humor Ralph Payson's fantastic whims, and conciliate his wayward fancies, to be supplanted at last by a black-eyed little governess!"

But Miss Ware did not fully appreciate the dangerous advantage her unconscious enemy had gained until that afternoon, when she passed the half-open school-room door, on her way upstairs to her own apartment.

It was a bright, cheerful room, airy and spacious, with sunshine singing in the windows, and a full flood of western sunshine streaming across the red carpets. Three shabby little fairhaired girls were busily writing copies at their centre-table, and Miss Monille was "finishing up" a water-color drawing, at her own little desk, by the window. All right so far—all perfectly proper, correct, and educational; but there was a rebellious, individual present whom Miss Ware could cheerfully have omitted from the dramatis personæ. Ralph Payson was leaning over the chair, and smilingly criticising the progress of the artist. It was a pretty tableau—the tall splendidly proportioned young man, with his dark wavy hair, and chocolate-brown eyes, and the exquisite flower-like beauty of the girl. Nor did Geneva fail to mark, with her scathing glance, the soft, absorbed light of Ralph's eyes, and the deepening color in the brown cheek of his pretty pupil. Yet, somehow Geneva Ware failed to regard it simply as a tableau; she did not see its effective points! And she stole softly over the mossy carpet, pausing on to her room, without having been seen, more deeply resolved than ever, that the little governess must be got rid of, by fair means, or foul!

She began her quiet machinations the very next morning.

"My dear aunty," she coaxed, after they had entered the carriage for Mrs. Payson's usual matutinal drive, "what on earth induces you to keep that little bit of an old-fashioned dig in your school-room? She has no style at all!"

"She's well enough," returned Mrs. Payson, apathetically, "and my children are exceedingly reasonable. As for style, the girls are so young that I really don't think her manner makes much difference; although, I must say, she's very ladylike—a clergyman's daughter, I'm told."

"A French governess would be much preferable," urged Geneva, "and I heard yesterday that Mademoiselle Merande was at present awaiting a situation."

"Nevertheless, I prefer Miss Monille. The children are very fond of her, and she is so shabby-genteel in keeping an eye to my laces and jewels and things."

Geneva was baffled; but a reprise is not a defeat. She returned yet again to the charge—this time, however, from a new quarter.

"Ah! but Ralph, my impulsive aunt, did it never occur to your superior wisdom, that somebody else was fond of Miss Monille, besides the children?"

Mrs. Payson turned her round blue eyes wonderingly towards Geneva.

"I don't quite catch your meaning."

Geneva coughed meaningly.

"Your governess' mother seems fully to appreciate all Miss Monille's good qualities."

"Nonsense!" said Mrs. Payson, comfortably closing her plump hands together in her muff-warmer. "It's a nothing on earth but one of Ralph's flirtations. Do let him amuse himself."

Geneva sighed, but, for, just, undoubtedly ben an utter failure. Geneva, however, nothing disheartened or discouraged, set herself diligently to the task of new projections.

Ellice Monille could not long remain in ignorance of her cousin Ellice Geneva Ware's bitter, uncompromising enemy. All her little innuendoes to conciliate the haughty blonde—all her soft, cunning ways, were like blandishments addressed to the ground. And many a time, when Geneva's bitter sarcasm, or sweeping glance of scorn overwhelmed the sudden tears in the dark Spanish eyes, Ralph Payson would whisper soothingly:

"Don't mind her ungenerous taunts, Ellice—they are not worth one single moment's pain!"

But Geneva Ware bided her time with a concentrated malice of which meek little Ellice could not possibly have an idea.

* * * * * *

"Ellice, you have Ramona's spirit—color, aunt, of course, as it is to be a full dress occasion?"

"Certainly! Just hand it to me, Geneva, that's a darling!"

There was to be a deliciously exclusive matinée at one of the most aristocratic of all New York's aristocratic mansions. Mrs. Payson and Miss Ware had hunched early off roasted gnails, garnished with chard sauce, and now, after at least two hours diligently spent at the toilet, were approaching the triumphant zenith of their labors.

"I am determined I'll be the best dressed woman there; or I'll retire from society!" was Mrs. Payson's inwardly-breathed vow.

Consequently Mrs. Payson was absolutely gorgeous in a rose-colored brocade dress, strewn all over with sparkling and many-hued gems—real diamonds flashing from her ample person, that their indescribable glitter actually made poor Jenkinson's eyes ache, as she surveyed the magnificent tout ensemble. Geneva Ware, scarcely less splendid, in a robe of lustrous white silk, and a pearl-white opera cloak trimmed with gold lace stood by nonchalantly, playing with her silver bouquet-holder. She leaned over to look into the child's astonished face.

"It is not here, aunt?"

"Not here!" echoed the lady. "It must be there, Geneva! I always keep it in that one box!"

"Perhaps you have dropped it in among the others?" suggested Miss Ware.

Mrs. Payson sought nervously among her trousseau, and the boxes were turned inside out, and caskets upside down, in a chaos of hopeless confusion, with no better success. The Spanish point lace collar could not be found. Even the plump matron looked aghast at her niece.

"What can have become of it, Geneva?"

The young lady arched her golden eyebrows.

"I am sure I have not the least idea, aunt!"

"Ellice, you have not taken it, surely?" panted Mrs. Payson, growing visibly pale beneath the artificial bloom on her lip and cheek. "A two hundred and fifty dollar piece of lace surely cannot have vanished without hands!"

"Certainly not," asserted Geneva. "Try and remember where you saw it last, aunt."

"At Miss Marchal's musical soirée, I believe—yes, I am quite sure of it—on last Tuesday," said Mrs. Payson, suddenly striking out her hand to her forehead in a spasmodic effort at connected thought.

"Did you replace it in that box yourself?"

"No; I was very tired when I undressed, and Miss Monille took care of it."

"Ah! Miss Monille took care of it, did she?" repeated Geneva, dryly. "Excellent care, it would appear!"

Mrs. Payson started involuntarily. "Geneva! what do you mean by insinuations?"

"Ah, my dear, confiding aunt!" sighed Geneva, "your trust in human nature is too great; you judge every one by your own frank disposition. I never have been able to comprehend the confidence you have always reposed in Miss Monille. She has frequently admitted, both in your presence and mine, the fact of her extreme poverty, and——"

"But surely, Geneva," interrupted Mrs. Payson, in a disturbed voice, "you don't suppose Ellice Monille has stolen my collar?"

Geneva depressed her long eyelashes with a gentle, little, regretful sigh.

"Dear aunt, we are all fallible, and it was a great temptation to place in the girl's way."

Mrs. Payson turned short round to her openmouthed maid who was eagerly listening to the conversation.

"Jenkinson! go to the school-room immediately, and tell Miss Monille I desire to see her immediately—do you hear?—immediately!"

As a matador or two, Miss Monille obeyed the summons, all unconscious of the ordeal that awaited her.

"Miss Monille!" began the lady abruptly, "where is my Spanish point collar?"

Ellice looked surprised.

"Is it not in the box, Mrs. Payson?"

"No, Miss Monille, it is not!" angrily enunciated Mrs. Payson, beginning to grow very red in the face. "And I will not to understand that I consider you responsible for it!"

"Me?"

Ellice Monille's cheek had blanched.

"You certainly had it last!" chimed in the cold, hard voice of Miss Ware. "Believe me, Miss Monille, you will be consulting your best interests in giving it up at once!"

"Give it up?" I have was color enough now in Ellice's startled face. "Do you for a moment believe, Mrs. Payson, that I have taken your lace?"

Mrs. Payson flushed and faltered; there was something in the clear light of Ellice's eye that disconcerted her.

"Of course you have, there can be no doubt on the matter," Geneva said; "but you may at once return it. I have searched in every imaginable place for it, and I can come to no other conclusion."

"Geneva, you are mistaken," Ellice began, "and avoid the mortification of further exposure. My aunt will not be very hard upon you, considering that this is the first offence."

Ellice Monille turned upon Geneva like a hunted lioness at bay.

"How dare you address me in those terms, Miss Ware? I, who am as innocent as yourself!"

"I will have no insolence, if you please, Miss Monille," said Mrs. Payson, whose lips had grown very cold and rigid. "There is but one alternative for you to adopt, my dear, if you will have the kindness to send John for a policeman, to search Miss Monille's goods and possessions. I am entirely willing to abide by your decision—I am not witnessing such wicked obduracy and depravity in one so young. You will be old enough to remain here, in my presence, until the policeman arrives. I do not wish the rich of deceit and mystery to become any longer familiar to a child in my house."

And Ellice stood there, white and silent, listening to the tumultuous beating of her own heart, and feeling that a crisis was upon her—a crisis from which Mrs. Payson calmly contemplated her hothouse bouquet, and Geneva's blue eyes flashed with triumph, would sweep across her future, for every moment now was widening the gulf between Ralph Payson and the pale governess, who was accused of theft!

But, in spite of the active and unrelenting search, no clue made its appearance.

"I surprise you, aunt," said Geneva Ware, scornfully. "Of course she was much too wise to preserve any witness against herself!"

Mrs. Payson's torpid nature was now thoroughly aroused.

"You will leave this house at once, girl," she said, stamping her foot passionately, "and don't refer to me for any future character. I have not the least doubt that you stole my collar, you bad, ungrateful creature, though you have contrived to evade your deserts. Don't stand there, but pack up your things at once! Good gracious! that to think of the horrid influences to which my poor dear little girl may have exposed!"

Ellice silently obeyed, moving like one who walks through the mazes of a bewildered dream. The strange mixture of mental excitement and exhaustion tightening even closer around her failing footsteps, and she felt the utter hopelessness of any appeal or remonstrance.

"Of course," resumed the indignant matron, giving her glimmering pink silk robes a toss, as if to shake off the dust, "I shall remove that girl's princess breathed, "you will not have the audacity to ask for your half year's salary. It is scarcely all the part of the value of the lace you have stolen from me!"

Ellice made no reply. She knew that she was almost penniless; yet, at that moment, she would cheerfully have accepted starvation sooner than receive a farthing of Mrs. Payson's money! And at this time Geneva stood looking on, with a bitter curve to her lips and a malignant sparkle to her cold, cruel eyes.

Yes, she had triumphed at last.

From the palace of Fifth avenue to a little brick house in Jersey City, besmutted by no less than three distinct families, is rather an abrupt transition, but Ellice Monille, so, alas! than many of the transitions we daily meet with in the life. And Mrs. Benson was only the wife of a lawyer's clerk, and her little first floor rooms were the brightest little suite in New York!

And so they were, with bright red curtains at the window, and pots of scarlet verbenas and mignonette drinking in the sunshine, and the black-leaded stove, winking, with red eyes of flame, at the strips of mahogany bookcase that never held any books, but turned into a hedstead at night in the most ingenious and incomprehensible manner! And Barbara Benson, singing at her work, and counting the hours until her husband should come home from his treadmill of labor, never dreamed of the dark shadow of trial that was descending on the horizon of her young sister's life.

"Ellie! My darling!"

She started to her feet with a slight, involuntary scream, as the door opened and Ellice Monille hurried in, pale and trembling, with large, dark eyes, that seemed to be beyond the blessed relief of tears. Barbara threw her arms around the new comer, and held her close, close to her heart, as she had held her years ago, in the first lonely moments of their mutual orphanage.

"What has happened, Ellice? Tell me?"

And Ellice, for the first time finding the gateway of tears, sobbed out all her griefs upon that loving breast.

"It's a shame! a burning shame!" reiterated little Mrs. Benson, biting her cherry lip, and striving desperately to keep back her tears. "Never mind, darling, you shall stay with me. It won't be but a little while before you succeed in obtaining a better situation, and——"

"I shall never be able to get another situation, Barbara. My prospects for life are blasted by this—this strange misunderstanding," and Ellice's head drooped again on her sister's shoulder.

"Misunderstanding! That is not the right word! call it a wicked, double-dyed sin, Ellie!" exclaimed Mrs. Benson, her own tears now dropping fast in sympathy. "Oh! when will the rich cease to oppress the poor? is there no justice for us either in earth or heaven?"

At that moment a knock sounded gently on the panels of the door. Ellice started, and the color bloomed out redly on her cheeks—roses beneath a rain of tears—as Ralph Payson entered the room.

"Mr. Payson!"

"Yes, it is I, Ellice. I have just heard the whole impossible tale," he said, coming to her side. "I knew you would naturally turn for a refuge to your sister, and entrusted to Jane Jenkinson, Mr. Payson—you do not believe I took the lace?" she faltered, almost under her tremulous breath.

"I should like to see the white purity of heaven's angels is sullied by aught of earthly stain? Ellice if the whole world were to rise up in accusation against you, I would be ready to be honored as a My Rosson!"

"I am glad of that! I am glad!" she murmured, with a moisture on her dark eyelashes.

"Ellice," he went on, "may I prove the respect and devotion I have felt for you since the first moment in which we met?—may I ask you, in this hour of trial and desolation, to trust your future happiness in my hands—to become my dear and cherished wife?"

She put her hand confidingly in his.

"Ralph, you—perhaps—when that dark cloud has passed away from my life."

The rest of the sentence was lost in tears, but Ralph Payson understood:

"Oh, Ralph, don't think me cold or ungrateful, but I would sustain you through a thousand trials such as this. And in the future——"

"I have nothing to do with the future, Ellice," he said, with a certain quiet resolution that it was impossible to oppose. "I claim my privilege now. Before the sun goes down this night, I wish to call you mine!"

Poor Ellice, it was a brief, strange wooing, not at all like those she had dreamed of in her early girlhood, when Ralph Payson had been a handsome, idle relief upon its new prop and shelter. How could the lips shake "No," when the heart spoke "Yes," and all the unselfish impulses of the nature of its exceeding joy? And almost before she knew it, little Barbara Benson, laughing and crying hysterically by turns, had tied the strings of her little brown bonnet, and adjusted the crimson shawl, and was holding her away in the dark-haired city church, where they were quietly married, in the shifting gold and purple gleams of the oriel window, just as the sun was setting, after evening service.

And the slender bride, looking shyly up in her husband's frank face, murmured:

"Oh, Ralph, I hope it is not wrong to be so very, very happy?"

But Ralph, kissed Barbara Benson, from behind her pocket handkerchief, "as if God didn't intend us to be happy! I don't believe in the theology that wears a long face and shuts its eyes for fear of seeing heaven's sunshine."

Several days elapsed before Ralph Payson found any leisure to pay a visit to the marble-fronted mansion in Fifth avenue. But his pretty little wife, and when at length he was ushered into the elegant boudoir, where his portly sister-in-law was sitting, Mrs. Payson opened her eyes wide, and Miss Geneva Ware smiled a fascinating welcome.

"Dear me, Ralph, what a stranger you are," said the elder lady, while Geneva drew forward a chair.

"Am I?" he returned dryly. "It is very possible, for much of my time latterly has been devoted to my wife."

"Your wife!" echoed Mrs. Payson, scarcely crediting the evidence of her own ears. Geneva's soft color deepened a shade, and she closed her book over the book she had been reading, until the visitor should depart.

"My wife. I was married last week to Ellice Monille."

"Monille! The girl that stole my—"

She was interrupted by the light footfall of Miss Denham, the new governess—a tall, freckled lady, with light eyelashes and persistently thin lips.

"Well, Miss Denham, what is it?" petulantly questioned Mrs. Payson. "What is the trouble in the school-room now? what have the children been doing? Really, I don't have a minute's peace of my life!"

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," apologized the shadowy governess, hesitating as to whether it would be better to advance or retreat, "but I thought you would be pleased to learn that your lace collar has been found!"

"Found!"

The words broke in an almost involuntary sound from Geneva Ware's ashy white lips, as she leaned breathlessly forward.

"Yes, ma'am, found. The children were playing with Miss Ware's desk—I told them it was wrong to touch it—but they are scarcely as amenable to discipline as I could wish. And Laurretta dropped it, quite accidentally, breaking the hinges, and scattering the contents on the floor—and in the little secret drawer, whose spring was broken ...

"It is false! it is false!" shrieked Gemeva, springing to her feet, with a face where all the evil passions strove together for mastery. "It is a concerted tale—a lie!"

The next minute she sank back on the sofa, in strong hysterics.

Mrs. Payson shrank away from Gemeva, as if her very touch were pollution, and gathered her voluminous skirts from contamination with one hand, while with the other she took up her superb Spanish guitar, viewing it with a very critical look. Ralph smiled a cold, bitter smile, more akin to a sneer.

"I hope you are now satisfied, madam, who it was that stole your lace," he said, speaking very calmly. "The petty malice which could stoop to plan another's misery—perhaps ruin—on such a foundation as this, is beyond all scorn!"

"I—I am very sorry, Ralph," began Mrs. Payson timidly.

"Stop, madam!" he interrupted, sternly; "your sorrow comes too late. You should have taken all those things into consideration long ago. My wife has no need for further pity or sympathy."

"It's all Gemeva's fault," sulked Mrs. Payson. "I won't have her in the house another day! I'll send her home this very night—the ungrateful treacherous girl! To think that she should steal away my Spanish point collar, and lay the blame on poor dear little Ellice! Oh, the wickedness of this world!"

And Mrs. Payson, in her genuine indignation at Gemeva's duplicity, never, for a moment, fancied that her own conduct had not been spotlessly correct and right. There are too many Mrs. Paysons in the world!

Miss Geneva Ware's husband-hunting expedition came to rather an unsuccessful termination, considering the amount of diplomacy she had expended on it. She went home that very night per express train (for Mrs. Payson kept her word, and would listen to no coaxing expostulations), in company with seven trunks, two hooped-skores and a guitar case, reflecting bitterly on the vanity of her winter campaign. For Gemeva could not but admit to herself that although she had deprived Ellice Neville of her situation as governess, that the situation that young lady had since obtained as wife, was infinitely preferable.

And Ellice was happy, with a calm, serene happiness that was like "clear shining after rain." Through trial, she had achieved a great and exceeding peace!

THE GREAT CONFLAGRATION IN NEW YORK.

Burning of Barnum's Museum.

At 12 o'clock on the afternoon of the 13th inst. the upper Hall fronting, in New York, on Ann alarm, and almost immediately it was known by telegraph throughout the city that the world-renowned Barnum's Museum was on fire.

The rush to the scene was immense, and in less than an hour Barnum's City Hall Park, Broadway, Ann, Nassau, Vesey and Ann streets, in the vicinity of the fire, were nearly blocked by thousands of excited spectators. In a brief while the flames could be seen emerging from the museum in every direction. Fortunately there were not many persons in the building at the time, but if there had been, a number of lives must have been lost, as rapidly did the conflagration extend.

The firemen were promptly on hand, and mounting the balcony on the Ann street side, they dashed on the roaring flames, but several streams were turned on the interior of the building. The flames, however, gained rapid headway, and at short intervals burst from the interior of the structure, with the exception of that portion of it facing on Broadway, was a mass of flames, while a dense pall of smoke enveloped the whole of the building.

Hopes were at first entertained that the fire might be confined within the walls of the museum, but in spite of all the efforts of the firemen, who were nobly seconded by the citizens, it soon communicated to the adjoining buildings, ten of which were burned to the ground and several others partially destroyed. The entire contents of the museum the streets of the caged animals were let loose, and had individuals possessed most of them, had there for the fact made much progress, and many of them escaped; but with the exception of the tenanted cell, the entire collection of animals perished in the flames.

To the denizens of Gotham the destruction of the museum seems as yet but a dream. Situated as it was on the most business part of Broadway, in the very heart of that thoroughfare and Ann street, "Barnum's corner," as that locality was commonly called, has for years past been one of the attractive points of the city, and even for the over prominent danger which threatened persons of those who were interested, during the progress of the day, to cross from one side to the other of New York's most renowned avenue. A building of large dimensions and naturally imposing appearance, the most proprietor had made its exterior still more apt to attract the attention both of strangers and residents by almost covering it with pictorial designs, suggestive of what might be seen inside. Barnum's Museum was one of the old landmarks with which every New Yorker was conversant, and to see which every stranger, on visiting the city, must as a matter of course, find a leisure—during his sojourn here. Mr. Barnum knew full well the value of extended publicity, and in making a liberal use of the facilities afforded by the press, the name and nature of this establishment became well known.

Any one who has ever visited the museum will acknowledge that it contained a collection of curiosities unequaled in the world for their variety and character. A few moments's reflection will convince any intelligent mind that such a man as Mr. Barnum, making the exhibition of curiosities the labor of his life, could hardly be imposed upon by worthless articles; and although while catering to the public taste, some of his exhibitions have been called "humbugs," yet, taken his collection as it existed on the morning of the 13th inst., and counting over the various efforts he has made to please his patrons it more or less expensive ways, no one can say that Mr. Barnum has failed in any one particular for the exhibition of one of the most complete museums of natural curiosities ever seen on this continent, or perhaps in the world. He was assiduous in his endeavors to gather within the precincts of his museum all that was novel or curious, whether of the handiwork of nature or of the artisan, and at the time of its destruction the American museum was most completely fitted with all that was wonderful, and much that was truly beautiful and rare.

The museum, in a commendable, with some friends as the Astor House, on the morning after the fire, said: "I will now turn to building, as and the building it will astonish the world. On the roof I will have my menagerie of wild beasts from all parts of the world. There will be three times the size of my late establishment, and as for curiosities, there will be no such thing as collecting them, for I will make them."

Mr. Hurd, Mr. Barnum's business manager, estimates that $200,000 will cover the loss of the building and of the museum, which cost over $1,000,000. Altogether, the loss by the conflagration will amount to about $2,000,000, none of which was covered by insurance.

A Sample of French Crime.

In going over a file of Paris newspapers ranging from the year 1850 to that of 1859, I am forcibly reminded of many of the cases of French crime; the first being its epidemic nature, causing especial crimes to run in strata, so that for a certain period a particular style of murder will be fashionable, which in time will change to another phase of life-taking, or another crime; and the next is the nationality of the crime. In England, the Americas excelling in financiering and business crime; the English in burglaries and pocket picking; the Irish in assaults and petty larceny, and the French and Germans go hand in hand in the more delicate crimes, the Germans excelling in those requiring daring and finesse. To show this I shall cite a few samples culled from the files before me, and extracted from the journals.

The first is the case of the murder of one Anne Marie Constant, of Aveyron, who was the daughter of a family of wealth and standing. She died, leaving her a handsome inheritance, principally in ready money. Marie had a sister, married to a man named Poppels, of Aveyron, who resided, and who coveted Marie's share of the patrimonial wealth. The French law of inheritance is so complicated as to tempt to crime, it frequently providing, without power of alteration, that the members of a family shall share alike, and that a death occurring among brothers and sisters, their portion shall be divided among the rest.

Marie's desire to possess her sister led her sister and the husband to approach a woman of known bad repute in the neighborhood with offers of money for her services. The woman willing to for the mode of accomplishment, which was to bring a message from her confessor that he wished to see her immediately, while Marie was on their way to the father's house, at a certain point on the river bank, she was to be pushed in, and left to drown at her leisure. The crime was done according to order, and, by the admirable French police system, brought home to the guilty ones, brought to trial, when, by the confession of the woman, Penchon, it was elicited that Marie's sister, with her husband, had procured the crime, and having stated as a matter of business what they wanted, offered her the half of a pig, and a handful of potatoes, for her pay, which they afterwards added a barrel of flour, but, Penchon standing out for higher wages, one hundred francs was added to the pig, the potatoes and flour. It is needless to add that the trio met with the fullest punishment.

Another of these domestic crimes was that of the family of Rouillon, of Lyons, the head of which, a man of much wealth, had built up his property among five children for a stipulated annuity. There was continual animosity and quarreling among the children, the husbands, and they afterwards added a barrel of flour, but, Penchon standing out for higher wages, one hundred francs was added to the pig, the potatoes and flour. It is needless to add that the trio met with the fullest punishment.

Another of these domestic crimes was that of the family of Rouillon, of Lyons, the head of which, a man of much wealth, had built up his property among five children for a stipulated annuity. There was continual animosity and quarreling among the children, the husbands, and what shares each of them should pay of the annuity, these disputes continuing for almost a year, until one day the old man was found dead, with his head in the fire, half consumed. The inquest decided that he had fallen in a fit while sitting at the fire, but, some weeks after the funeral, the quarrels between the family breaking out afresh, the husband of one daughter declared that he had seen the old man beat killed by his eldest daughter with a poker, and the body then put into the fire, that it might consume the evidence of the blow.

Another family case is that of Stephen Pongy, of Perpignan, who had married two wives and two fiancées, with his wife, son and daughter. He was of bad temper, treating all about him with severity and cruelty, but his chief cause of resentment with his children to pay them a certain monthly sum for his living, and for the support of his property. It was stated was that the old men was half starved, and was frequently forced to beg a morsel of food, or to steal enough food, while his children held every cent of his property, and openly expressed a wish for his death. One morning he was found in his bed, dead, covered, literally, with bruises. The wife and children were arrested, and in defence it was stated that the old man had been in the habit of fits and insults with great patience, and that they were strict attendants on church. The result was the finding of guilty with extenuating circumstances," and they were each condemned to five years' imprisonment.

The two favorite crimes of the French are poisoning, the fashionable entrée of the middle and upper classes, and "terrorism," that of the lower orders. This "terrorism" takes its name from some wretch who, having by undetected, or unpunished, crime, become daring to extremity, sets himself up as a terror of the neighborhood in which he has located, and levies tribute, brigand-like, on every one that comes within his reach. It would be supposed that such a character could not exist long in any locality, but experience teaches differently in France, as a few notable instances will show.

In the department of the Learn there was a man named Tirard Galier who set himself up as a "terror." He had been eight times in prison for his crimes, and every time had broken forth, until the country people superstitiously believed that no bars or bolts were strong enough to hold him. His relatives, to whom he was an especial terror, were anxious to get rid of him, and at last the eighth breaking out made great exertions for his capture. When he was finally arrested by their agency, he swore terrible vengeance, and when his cell within a week broke from the prison at Grenoble, and re-appeared in their midst. His first thought was his vengeance, and having visited the house of an aunt and finding the family all away at church, for it was Sunday, he took a large quantity from the wall, and lay in wait for them in the road. Within an hour he had subred his aunt and two cousins, and with the bloody weapon on a tree-pply, paraded the village hoasting of his work, finally dining at a cabaret, and entertaining the company with his brutal, shocking and revolting Canadian songs. That night he burned the houses of four of his relatives, and so great was the terror inspired by this threats, that not one person went to extinguish them or to aid the sufferers. He was followed in safety to his home in fear after several days, and then to go away unmolested. Nearly a year afterwards he was arrested at Arcat, several hundred miles from the scene of his murders, and was condemned to death.

Another instance of "terrorism" was that of Prosper Duquesne, native of the Haute Saone, who for a year roamed about that place armed with half a score of different weapons, and threatening the lives of all he encountered. When he entered a house, the inhabitants instantly fled, abandoning their goods to him, or instantly proceeding to all his demands. At last the officers of justice got upon his track, and he was pursued. He was gathered from them that he was hunted him to one of his strongholds, where he quietly waited their advance, cool one of them, and fled. His grandmother, who had been his principal shelter in any of the neighboring houses, first Dugood, hearing of it, should visit them, and, by a combination of people, they were herded his last unsheltered. Prugaud was afterwards taken and executed.

A third case of the same crime was that of one Victor Marsac, who had made his name such a terror in the Var, that every child was taught used it to scrify children, and the last words of parting friends were, "God protect you from Marsac!" He was a man of fine education and great strength, and none knew from whence he had originally come. He robbed and murdered for years with impunity, at last, when he fell into the hands of justice, after a pursuit involving great strategy and bravery, the government were unwilling to execute him, from the unwillingness of his victims to testify, through the fear of his escape and vengeance. At last, three days were given to parents and promises inspired with confidence, a mass of evidence came that showed how persons had disappeared, and, generally, in some inexplicable crime, a man without a breath against his good name, declaring that he had known of Marsac's connection with the crime, but was afraid to breathe a hint of it, even to his most intimate friend.

Of late, the list comes poisoning, an art in which the French have reached great perfection. A few cases will show the style.

Madame Lorial, a physician at Nièvre, took from school an only daughter, and brought her home to live. In a few months she was Hercules' favorite, a woman who, it seems, had always cherished a belief that Dr. Lorial would some day marry her, and, seeing that the presence of Madame Lorial stood in the way of her plans, and for that reason procceded to remove her, the means being poison. A few cases of the most violent cholera—and dreadful making the young girl sick with something that caused pain and vomiting, and then undertaking to cure her, administered poison in the mixture. The victim seemed to know, instinctively, what was going on, and spoke of it freely to her father and friend. The aunt, though not believing the matters as told by Louise, sent her own physician to see the man, who, though not a friend though, as he testified on the trial, he felt sure that Louise was right, and made an attempt to take the poisoned drugs from the medicine chest of housekeeper's hands; but on the latter's refusing to give way, himself yielded, and the poisoning went on until the girl was dismissed from school, the girl could say, for four months, and the end of which time she died, a victim of the most horrible and excruciating physician, whom the aunt had sent, full of remorse for his want of firmness, declared that he had found the girl suffering from tense of months gone by. The housekeeper was arrested, and the whole horrible confession came out, she having been poisoning her employer by degrees, daily and hourly, with arsenic and opium; and that notwithstanding the victim had told the aunt twenty people of what she believed was being done.

Many cases of poisoning are cited in which the poisoner appeared to have no motive for his acts, one of which was that of Jobard, a well-to-do farmer of the Deux Sevres, who refused to take a bribe of a few hundred francs to the public fountain with several pounds of arsenic. When the evening arrived, he and his family met at the fountain to fill their pails and pitchers, one with stronger eyes than the rest saw the white powder at the bottom, and cautioned the curiosity of the others. Many minutes did not elapse before it was known that the white powder was arsenic, and the alarm went so quickly over the place that scarcely a person drew water was drunk to produce more sickness, no death resulting from the pollution. The accused was traced to Jobard, and Jobard was placed beyond the reach of another such eccentricity.

At one time a stranger entered a house belonging to one Couvigny, in the Seine Inferieure, and asked for accommodation for the night, which was granted him. At supper he spoke of his power of prophecy, and said to his host, "You are a man of many sorrows, but you will see still more. Prepare for the worst." The next morning the host died, and it was found that poison had been mixed with his food, as the man afterwards confessed, by the traveller, that he might see his mysterious prediction become true, and boast it.

Among the strange murders that committed by Alfred Virres, a bookkeeper in a house at Dijon, seems the most unaccountable. For many years he had been a most diligent and correct business man, never giving his employers the least cause to find fault with him. One day he suddenly quitted his desk, and without informing any one, or taking any leave, started on a visit to the Isle de Chalons. Arrived there, the omnibus to convey passengers to the steamboat came up, and Vernas took it, and was set down at the wharf. On arriving there he sauntered about the town, spending what money he had, and evincing no disposition to do anything or speak to anybody. Upon the third day he spent his last cent for a cheap knife and a ticket to the theatre, and started for that place. As he walked along, a young girl was in front of him. She was a perfect stranger, he had never seen her before, but without a moment's time the flew at her, and stabbed her to death by three blows planted directly in the heart. An attempt was made to save him murder, but it did not succeed, and he was sent to the halls for life.

The last case we shall tell is that of Sicard, who killed his wife in 1854, at the Hotel des Princes in Paris.

The wife was the daughter of one of Napoleon's chamberlains, and Sicard was the son of a gendarme. Having run away with her, married by bribing her nurse, stole the girl, and carried her from Bordeaux to Paris. The parents traced their child, and claimed her, but before time Sicard was not heard of until the girl had reached her majority, when he suddenly appeared, and published his wife's shame. The scandal was indignantly refused. He thereupon barraigned the parents for the greatest plea of the age, the crimes of the aristocracy, and heading them against the ex-chamberlain's house, beat down all defensive power, carried off the young girl in open day, took her to Paris, and there by the most terrific threats forced her to marry him. From that time he constantly beat and ill-used her, until she was forced to appeal to the police for protection, and a separation was had.

One day he called upon her apartments at the hotel, and imitating the voice of her child, called her, and upon her entering the room, shot her dead.

Which ends the sample of French crime.

A PARIS STORY.

THE Paris correspondent of the New Orleans Crescent gives the following:

"Eastern-ers a wealthy banker went to one of the famous jewelers' shops in the Rue de la Paix, and asked to look at some diamonds. As he knew the proprietor, the handsomest on hand were shown to him, and he selected two which cost 40,000 francs. He put his wallet in the casket which contained the jewel, and ordered all to be placed in a great sugar-cup—for our eastern eggs are in confections. Beckford in Milk—and, requesting the name of a popular dancing girl of the grand opera. He added, by the way, she was or soon would be vastly. He selected a ring worth $100, and placed it in a sugar cup. "Send that to Mme. ——," giving his own name. He gave the both wishes, and enjoyed with a light step to his club, played his accustomed game of whist, and then left for Africa much the dancing girl's lodgings. She was lolling on her sofa. She received him with a smile, as she knew that after a man has made a Parisian a present of 44,000 he has a right to expect a return, and accompanied her caress at her friendship. After showing him enough for a short time, she said, "But, my dear friend, you should have brought me a present." She said to the latter: "Cadile, show the gentleman to Mlle. Augustine. Cadile, with characteristic impudence of laquais' allegrité threw her head back, and, with a wink, said, "Augustine has the gift rang he had selected for his wife. The dancing girl's eyes flashed with delight when that valuable was delivered to her. It was still early in the evening; Cadile was told to go to the theatre and return. At last he determined to go home. He was standing in his dining-room, when he saw a man, with a large bouquet in each hand, approach. He was about to ring the bell, when the man, with a bow, said, "Monsieur, I have the honor to be the husband of Mme. ——, whom you sent a ring to, and ask if she will do me the honor of receiving me?" The banker, who had already forgotten the girl, ground he arranged his dress a little, and upon his valet's announcing the name, went to her rooms. She received him with open arms, exclaiming: "Are you really my husband? Oh, I am so happy!" The banker which sailed better with my taste; or, shall I not upbraid you?" "No! I am happy," he answered, amazed, "I shall be utter one word of reproach." She threw her arms around his neck, and, with a kiss on each of his cheeks, said the banker found the contrast between the vulgar, unpolished wife and the refined, intellectual dancing girl, delightful. Hours flew by as at home on swallow's wings. The banker, as he left, said that Sunday girl and he has since declared that he never knew what happiness was until Zaubertett.

MR. GATE, electrician, of Plymouth, has discovered a process by which powder can be rendered perfectly waterproof. The discovery passed every essential condition of experiment, and is considered to be the most valuable one ever made in connection with powder. The cost is very small, and it has the advantage of not in the least affecting the strength. Powder can be made non-explosive, and in another five minutes it can be restored to its original condition. We have seen gunpowder subjected to this process and afterwards ignited by a red-hot poker without success. It should have in a store filled with the prepared powder, and it would be safe. The process can be easily applied to the largest or smallest quantities, and it does not require any special apparatus. Mr. Gate has supplied will solve the serious difficulty which has been felt as to the safety of powder in time of war, as in war it will avert the danger which now arises from the powder magazines. The neighborhood of an explosive material.

NEWS travels sometimes keen found so tight that no wrench would remove them. This was because they had been soaked in the hand till they became warm, and had been applied to very cold screws in winter, the heat vanished by cooling make on, and thus held the screw with an immovable grasp. Always avoid putting a screw hot on a cold screw; and to remove it, apply a heater heated from its contact with the cold, so as to heat and expand it, and it will loosen at once—or a cloth wetted with boiling water will accomplish the same purpose.

INDIAN NAMES.

Ye say they have all pass'ed away,
That noble race and brave,
That their light canoes have vanished
From off the crested wave,
That 'mid the forests where they roam'd
There reigns no hunter's shout,
But their name is on your waters,
Ye may not wash it out.

'Tis where Ontario's billow,
Like ocean's surges is curled,
Where strong Niagara's thunders wake
The echo of the world.
Where red Missouri bringeth
Rich tribute from the west,
And Rappahannock sweetly sleeps
On Virginia's breast.

Ye say their cone-like cabins,
That clustered o'er the vale,
Have fled away like withered leaves
Before the autumn gale,
But their memory yeveth on your hills,
Their baptism on your shore,
Your everlasting rivers speak
Their dialect of yore.

Old Massachusetts wears it,
Within her lordly crown,
And broad Ohio bears it
Amid his roaring renown;
Connecticut hath wreathed it
Where her quiet foliage waves,
And bold Kentucky hreathed it hoarse
Through all her ancient caves.

Wachusett hides its lingering voice
Within his rocky heart,
And Alleghany graves its tone
Throughout his lofty chart;
Monadnock on his forehead hoar
Doth seal the sacred trust;
Your mountains build their monument
Though ye destroy their dust.

Ye call these red-browed brethren,
The insects of an hour,
Crushed like the noteless worm amid
The regions of their power;
Ye drive them from their fathers' lands,
Ye break of faith the seal,
But sam ye from the court of Heaven
Exclude their last appeal?

Ye use their unresisting tribes,
With talisman and slop and slow,
On through the trackless desert pass,
A caravan of woe;
Think ye the Eternal Ear is deaf;
His sleepless vision dim?
Think ye the soil's blood may not cry
From that far land to him?

CHAPTER XVIII.—MOTHER AND SON.

IT was about two in the morning—a cold, gray twilight it was, such as sets us at loggerheads with ourselves and everything around us—that Lady Anne Ireton returned home, shivering as with intense cold, and covered with mud and blood.

The servant who let her in did not observe her condition, for she ran up the stairs hurriedly, and passed him by without speaking.

Passed him by, and went into her own chamber to tremble at the past, to shudder at the present, to prepare and battle for the future.

She sat down when she entered, in a hopeless kind of way, not taking off her things or lighting a lamp.

In her frame of mind light was more terrible than darkness.

Her thoughts were those natural to a criminal.

"I have committed a great crime in the darkness of the night," she thought, "and the morrow's dawn will discover it!"

There was the light, too, to dawn over her after a night of horrid dreaming—there was the long day to go through—the meeting of the family—the meals—and then the terrible ordeal when the murder was discovered, and the news of it was brought to her.

So she sat quiet for some time in her room, until at length some sort of her situation returned, and then, lighting the lamp, she undressed herself, thrust her clothes into a disused cupboard, and re-dressed herself.

Then she rang the bell, and ordered the servant who answered the summons to send her son to her.

It was a long time before Sir Arthur came.

When he did come, he looked pale, and haggard, and distressed, so much so, that his mother, even in her terrible position, observed it and spoke of it.

"You seem ill and distressed, Arthur," she said. "What is the matter?"

He flung himself into a chair, and began playing with his watch chain impatiently.

"Nothing—nothing!" he replied. "What is it you want with me?"

"Nothing pleasant, I fear," she said; "but still something which must be said now or at another time, and may as well be said now. Are you sure that no one can overhear us?"

"Yes—there is no one up but Thomas, the butler, and he is drunk!"

"Very well. It is of your sister Clara I wish to speak."

"What of her?"

"What of her?" cried Lady Anne, irritated by his impatient voice, "what of her? Is she not your sister? Has she not been carried away by a base villain, and do you ask me why I speak of her?"

At any other time Arthur Arbuthnot would have deferred hesitantly to his mother's opinion.

But at this moment circumstances had rendered him callous, dogged, indifferent to consequence.

He knew his mother in her true light—he had just come off a journey which had sickened and disgusted him.

"Well, speak of her," he said; "but don't let's talk morality. I know everything, mother. I know how, for sixteen years, you have kept my father in prison—I know his former history, his trials, his misfortunes, and your cruelty—I know how he escaped, and what for. So let us dismiss morality from our conversation, and talk merely of what you desire to be done."

Lady Anne glanced at her son in deep sorrow as he said these words.

It was a bitter thing for her to hear such things spoken in her by Sir Arthur; but yet was there anything to reply? Nothing.

"You have heard my own words, my son," she said, "therefore, I will not attempt to deny anything. But remember one thing—all I have done, I have done for the love of you and my daughters, one of whom has just been taken from me by a villain! He is a villain—ridiculous my morality if you choose—for what is a villain but a scoundrel—a woman from her home by false promises!"

Sir Arthur turned very pale, but he did not answer.

"Well, well," he cried; "what of Clara?"

"The man who has taken her away is named Denzil Harcourt," returned his mother. "He is the father of this man who ruined me! Let me tell you the story.

"Just a short time before I married your father I became acquainted with Denzil Harcourt's father.

"He was a tall, handsome fellow, well-built, well-featured, city-tongued—just the one to fascinate a girl of my ardent temperament; and I fell in love with him at first sight.

"There was no doubting the effect I produced upon him.

"After our first meeting—a romantic, accidental one by the river-side—he courted my presence every day; meeting me regular as rogues from me, he at length told his love.

"Up to this moment our interview had been unobserved by my family. I kept them secret, I know not why, except that girls see something romantic in the very act of secrecy.

"I had never seen any wrong in this secrecy of mine until now, when it flashed across me, 'What will my family say?' HAVE I been right in keeping them thus in ignorance of my years?'

"Before accepting Denzil Harcourt's addresses, I ventured to ask him my question.

"He laughed at me, patted my head, and told me that though I was a little foolish thing, I had acted with the wisdom of a Solomon—that I was quite right, in fact, in not telling any one of our courtship.

"'And now,' I said, with a rueful face—'now I shall have to explain it to them all at once.'

"'Not at all. Indeed, they must know nothing of our marriage,' he said, calmly. 'Your kind friends are very rich and influential, and have selected some one for me to marry, and would be enormously incensed if they knew I had wedded another.'

"'But you will have to tell them at last?' I said.

"'Oh, yes—that is quite another thing. I shall be called to the face of your parents, with due decies; and then, as he is my guardian and my household ogre, I shall be safe from annoyance or scolding.'

"Then, do you wish our marriage to be secret?' I asked.

"'Yes, for a time. Let us be married at once, and then you can remain at home just as if nothing had happened.'

"We did so, at length, after a long persuasion, it was arranged; yet day after day it was delayed. At last the fatal hour arrived which decided my fate.

"It was still evening in July; a warm sunshine had remained upon the earth after the sun went down, and we were sitting, talking, and laughing clear, though the twilight was just changing into night.

"Denzil Harcourt met me early, and we strolled away a long, long way among the merry corn-fields, and when we were tired, we stopped at a little country inn, and rested ourselves, and drank wine.

"It was dark when we returned, and we had a long distance to go, and, on our way, we sat down by the side of the river, where the moonlight shone brightly, and he told me of the fatal wedding. I must hurry over this scene. I was heated with wine; he clasped me in his arms, and I forgot my duty and my virtue.

"I went home, sad and weeping. The dream of passion over, I saw, in all its hideous reality, the fatal criminality of my conduct, and my fate came the terrible suspicion that my ruin had been premeditated on his part, and that now he would abandon me. This suspicion—it is deadly fear—haunted my every dream thet night.

"The next morning early he promised to come to me.

"I was punctually at the appointed place. He was not there. I waited—he came not. I might have waited for months, for I never saw him again.

"The same evening a secret messenger brought me a letter. It contained few words, but it was sufficiently insulting and degrading to me.

"It ran thus:

"'MY DEAR ANNE:

"'What happened last night has opened my eyes to the fact that we should never be happy together. We are both hot-tempered, and in after years reproaches might be freely handled between us. Forgive me if you can, and believe I am acting right in departing ere more evil has been done. Yours, ever,

"'ROBERT.'

"My son," said Lady Anne, "I am making to you a free confession—a confession, indeed, more than I should ever make to any one save the ear of her own children. But it has been rendered necessary by your visit to us of yore. It was compulsory upon me to tell you all, in order that you might understand my motives for terrible repentance."

"But upon whom is the vengeance to fall?" asked Sir Arthur.

Upon the one he loves—upon his son—the son of the one he sought in abandoning me—the one who has been the companion of his happy hours—the one who stole him from me, and my peaceful home, and with him in decrying my virtue. The son of this man he carried away your sister! Is he for you to follow—to behead him—to destroy him?"

Sir Arthur made no direct answer to this appeal.

His features worked strongly, and his face was pale; but it was evident to his mother that his passion was not caused by regard for her, or sorrow at her misfortunes.

"Do you refuse?" she asked.

"No—not entirely."

"What, then? Where do you make your reservation?"

"At murder—I do not precise that! I will leave that to you, who like it better, and are more practised at it than I."

Lady Anne almost leapt from her chair at these words.

"Arthur," she cried, in a trembling voice, "it is not your place to insult me! How dare you speak to me thus? What has made you so forget yourself?"

"Something more than your words—something more than anything I have heard emanating from you," he said. "As I was coming home just now, I saw two figures near the wooden bridge over the Devil's Dyke; the one, a man—the other, a woman. The moon was shining brightly down upon the spot, and I could see distinctly every object—the haggard features of the ragged tree, the deep ravine, the rugged sides, the noisome weeds even which crowned its banks, and plainly, therefore, the faces and forms of the two persons near the bridge.

"Somehow or another, I had a presentiment that mischief was intended, and I hastened my pace.

"I was too late, however, to prevent what was premeditated. The man retreated towards the moon, and precipitating herself upon him, plunged him into the Dyke; The woman's face I saw, as she reached me, was your own!"

His mother uttered a low, gasping cry, and sank back upon her chair, pressing her hand over her bosom, and uttering a low moaning even long after her son had ceased.

"You are mistaken," she replied.

It came, at length, in the form of a question.

"And the man—what of him?"

"I refused to be sworn—I have said," continued Sir Arthur, "and found that the unfortunate man had been flung down into a portion of the Dyke that was nearly dry and full of water.

"But hardly had I reached the spot, when a new phenomenon presented itself.

"The man lay there, a considered dead, rose from the place where he had fallen, and running along the edge of the Dyke with the speed of lightning, overtook you, and seized you by the dress. The rest you should know better than I; but I will tell it you, that you may see I am not romancing.

"The strength which had nerved him for his run seemed to desert him the moment he reached you; and, before I could gain the spot, I saw him raised, a blow given, and the man fall headlong into the Dyke, dragging you with him.

"When I did reach the spot, you had risen and fled away, while the man still lay among the reeds and grass.

"I crept down to aid him—if, indeed, aid was possible; but it was of no avail to follow one whom I could not overtake, so my assistance, I soon found that, though stunned and bleeding, he was not dead.

"What I lifted him to the edge of the dyke I dashed some water in his face, and, at last, had the pleasure of seeing him open his eyes."

"And what was the man?" asked his mother.

"His name was Sir Robert Arbuthnot," returned Sir Arthur. "He is my father."

CHAPTER XIX.—RALPH'S ADVENTURE.

WHEN Ralph St. Clare entered the room where the smugglers were assembled, he was greeted, as I have before said, with a shout of welcome.

There was which followed his entrance, however, a moment's silence of surprise.

The man whom I have mentioned before as appearing to be the leader, rose at once, and crossing the room, extended his hand to Ralph, saying:

"You are right welcome; you have been long expected."

Ralph retained the possession of the strong men's hand with a bewildered look at him, saying:

"Was I indeed expected? I did not know that my fame had travelled so far."

The smuggler returned, with a frowning wink towards his comrades, crying, with a loud voice:

"Three cheers for our noble captain, boys, and then we'll to business."

Three loud cheers resounded through the room, during which Ralph found himself dragged across it against his will, and placed at the head of the table.

"And now," cried Tomlinson, as the chief of the sea-banditti was called; "and now that we have shown you how welcome your presence is, perhaps you will condescend to what will be welcome to us—the letters from poor Douglas."

The astonishment depicted on Ralph St. Clare's face was genuine, that the smugglers at once came to the conclusion that a mistake had been made, and, as was natural, began to regard Ralph as an impostor; whereas, in reality, he had given them not the slightest reason for welcoming or even speaking to him.

He saw how matters stood at once.

The murmuring round the table was quite enough to prove this to him, and seeing that if he delayed he should be in peril, he rose and said:

"Gentlemen, there has, I fear, been some mistake. I am come here upon the most urgent business of your existence before. I am a fugitive, flying from justice, though I have committed no real crime. Therefore, you may believe me when I tell you now happy I should be to be received among you, though I call you to witness that I never, by word or deed, endeavored to impose upon you—never, for an instant, led you to suppose that I was your leader of course."

The men, annoyed as they were at their disappointment, could not fail to see the justice of his speech, and, after standing the one at the other, they burst into a hearty laugh.

It was easily explained to Ralph how the mistake occurred:

Frank Douglass, the former leader of the smugglers, had died at some distance from their usual haunt, and they had received a letter from him, indited on his deathbed, saying, that on a certain night a man should arrive at the inn, where they were now assembled, and deliver to them his credentials, signed by their former captain. As the person of his delegate was unknown to them, and Ralph had arrived just in the "nick of time," they were led naturally to suppose that he was their man.

Ralph's desire to enter their ranks was readily accorded to, and it was as one of themselves that he presently went through the several of the new captain, who arrived soon after.

On the night that he had seen him flying away from the presence of Claudia, his efforts, as he had done so because he had been involved with a gang of smugglers, and in their transaction, which, he felt, under the circumstances of his position, was indissolvable.

Up to this point, however, he had no conception that he was liable to any criminal charge; but, on the very next day he had discovered that the cheque given him by the man who discounted his bill was a forged one.

The man from whom it came had fled, and raising money on Ralph's bill, in London, had quitted the country.

It was for this reason that he fled to the gamingtable, hoping there to retrieve his fortunes, and to make up the money he had spent.

But it was of no avail. The person to whom he had paid the money was unacquainted with fear—fact of the exposure, he adopted the coward's plan of flight.

He gladly availed himself, therefore, of the chance offered him by his meeting with the smugglers, as one affording him the means of entire concealment.

He little guessed, however, how short would be his sojourn among them.

On the following day, strolling into the town to the post office, he inquired for a letter.

He had told Claudia, Mary Winter, as he always did, the name of the town to which his steps would much be directed, but he scarcely hoped she would write.

He was wrong. The heart that loved him so well in secret, did not forget him in his absence.

The letter was a short one, but it was to the purpose. It ran thus:

"DEARER RALPH:

"Return at once; there is no need of your absence. The bill you signed was never cashed in London in fact, for the man who was accused to have fled was only for the time concealing himself from my uncle's anger. The bill, in fact, was presented to you as a forged one—was read, and has been paid. You may ask, dear Ralph, why, if this be all this disturbance has been. This is easily explained. Gideon Gravleigh, who has a terrible grudge against your family, told you the story to alarm you. At any rate, dear Ralph, all can be explained when you return. Come back at once. Heaven bless you, Ralph, and believe me your ever loving,

"MARY."

To a man who had entertained the slightest suspicion of Gravleigh's treachery, this letter would have been enough to convey the idea that she was in love with him.

But it was not so.

His heart was bound up in Claudia, and the evident passion of Mary Winter found no response in his breast.

Oh, could he have seen her, as she wrote this letter, in the solitude of her own apartment, to have seen her leaning from her little bed over the table so she wrote, the flushes chasing themselves upon her face and neck, and the dishevelled hair, whose soft and round globes trembled in passionate longing for his return, hearing like the cold waves of the sea, though warm with the dark blood of early maidenhood—could he have seen her thus, he would have wondered how he could desert such beauty, no matter what might be the delications cause which prompted him to his treason.

But it was not to be. Fate had set upon his head as the friendly warning of a sister, and at once began to think of the means and necessity for departure.

To return to the inn, or to the haunt of his friends the smugglers, was evidently absurd, and even dangerous.

Having been initiated into their secrets, he could not for one moment imagine that they would allow him to go whither he listed, to betray them, myhe, either wilfully, or through misadventure.

The only thing, therefore, to be done was to make the best of his way from the town, and trust somewhat to chance for the means of subsistence,

So bravely determining, he at once set forth, never once glancing back upon the town, butwalking rapidly away from the point where his struggs and somewhat comical adventure had happened, towards Thornton—a distance of ninety miles.

The length of the journey, however, did not dismay him.

Though he was not possessed of funds, he had an abundance of spirit and courage; and with true dependence on these, he set forth with a light heart.

OUR RETURN NO ARMIES.

BY THEO. P. COOK.

In peni I to sing!
Let the notes of welcoming
From a million voices ring!
Blazing from the rolling drum,
Sound your praises, for they come—
Come, the trusty and the tried
They who fought our nation's fight have won—
Come, in all their manly pride,
For their mighty work is done.

These are they who boldly stood
Where the earth ran red with blood;
They who through the crimson flood
Waded for the common good.

Some there be who step to-day
Nexy and many e league away,
Down on Carolina shores,
Where the great Atlantic roars;
Or beneath Virginian sod,
Where the grasses wave and nod,
But their slumber, calmly deep,
Is the sleep that heroes keep;
And a nation bends and weeps
Over "the turf that wraps their clay."
And they rest in honor'd keep,
For to them—ah, wells-day!—
Heaven was opened through the fray!

Honor, honor, honor them!
Gems in Freedom's diadem,
All who raised the strong right arm,
In the cause of law and right,
Shielding Liberty from harm,
They are blessed in God's pure sight.

ONLY A CLOD.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—SUSAN'S GOOD NEWS.

MAUDE TREDETHLYN sat alone in her spacious chamber; oh, so spacious, so splendid, so dreary, so ghastly, with a tall carved walnut-wood bedstead that was like one of the tombs in Pierre la Chaise, only not lovely, and with long panels of looking-glass shimmering ghost-like in dark walnut-wood wreathen end armoires, and duchesse dressing-tables.

"I must go away somewhere, or I shall die," she thought; "this place seems haunted. I will go to papa. He is very good to me, but he does not understand what I feel about Francis. People speak so lightly of him, and seem to know him so little. If I could talk to any one who really loved him, if I could talk to any one who knew his goodness as I ought to have known it—as I do know it, now that he is dead."

She crossed the room hurriedly, and rang the bell. She had told her maid to keep lights out when she rang for them. When the candles came Maude went to a writing-table, and wrote a few hasty lines to her husband's simple little cousin. She had written to Susan once before, to tell her of Francis Tredethlyn's departure for Australia; but she had not seen each other since their first meeting.

"MY DEAR SUSAN—There is terrible news of your cousin; it may have reached you before this, perhaps. Will you come to me? I am so utterly miserable, and I think you are the only friend I can see in the world who can understand my sorrow. Come, dear, I implore you. Ever your affectionate

"MAUDE."

Mrs. Tredethlyn was a great deal too impatient to wait for any such commonplace means of communication as the post. She summoned her maid, and intrusted her letter to the faithful attendant, with directions that a groom should mount one of the park hacks immediately, and ride straight to Petersham with the letter.

Maude slept soundly that night for the first time since the tidings of the Kingfisher's fate had reached her, and woke in the morning to see Susan looking down at her with a smile upon her face.

"Ah, you don't know," cried Maude—you don't know what a load you have taken off my heart!"

"Of what, dear?" Susan asked gently.

"The loss of my daughter—the fire—the dreadful fire! Oh, Susan, you cannot have heard!"

Mrs. Tredethlyn said this, because the girl's face, though it was grave and sad, expressed none of that acute anguish which Susan ought to have felt for her cousin's untimely fate. She only looked at Maude with a wondering earnestness.

"Yes, it was very dreadful," she said. "Mrs. Clinnoch read it to the paper, and told me. I am so sorry for all the sufferers. But oh, Maude, dear cousin, how grateful we ought to be for the accident that saved Francis from such a fate! If he had gone by that vessel, dear—"

She stopped suddenly, for Maude looked at her with an unnatural stare, and then fell back unconscious.

No, he had not perished with the ill-fated passengers of the Kingfisher. Lives as noble had gone down to the deep waters; but Francis Tredethlyn had not made a part in the mighty sacrifice. When Maude recovered from the deadly faintness that had come upon her, Susan showed her a letter which she had received from her cousin—a letter that had been written in a hotel at Plymouth after the sailing of the Kingfisher.

"It might seem a foolish fancy to many people, but I don't think it will to you, Susy," he wrote. "I want to gather a handful of daisies from my mother's grave before I leave the soil that holds her for ever. I want to stand by the old hawthorn once more, though God knows what a pain it will be to me to see strangers in the old house. God bless you, dear, and good-by! I shall not write again till I write from the New World."

This was the close of the letter which Susan gave Maude. Her first feeling on reading it was unbounded gratitude to the Providence that had saved Francis Tredethlyn. Her second feeling was considerable indignation against Francis himself.

Then she was grateful to Providence again, and angry with herself for having been angry with Francis; and then she pounced upon Susan and kissed her.

"What am I to do, darling?" she asked; "I dare say he has gone off by some other horrible steamer. Somewhere he is, I won't stop idle in this dreary house. I won't trust everything to that slow solemn lawyer. I'll go to Cornwall myself, fancy, and find out all about it, and learn how long he stayed there, and when he left. You'll tell me where to go; won't you, Susy?"

While she was planning preparations for her departure, Mr. Kuradale, the solicitor, was announced. He came radiant and red-faced to tell her that Francis was in the Kingfisher.

"I'm did not ascertain that my husband had left Plymouth by any other vessel?" she asked.

"No."

"Then we may hope he is still in England. I am going to Cornwall immediately to search for him. At the worst, I shall hear all about him. I will go myself," she said; "if my husband is still in England I will find him. I will make sure that further misunderstanding between us if once we can meet face to face."

Maude was sorry to superintend her maid's packing of a small portmanteau, and Susan sat in the morning-room with Julia. It had been settled that Mr. Desmond should dine at the house of Peterah sare luncheon.

They were talking rather ceremoniously, when the door suddenly opened by an impetuous hand, and Miss Grundeson burst in upon them more impetuous than usual.

"They wanted me to go to the drawing-room, and they'd got had see of Mrs. Tredethlyn was at home!" exclaimed Julia, dropping a curtsy in going and seeing in. Not at home always; and I do se want to see that poor darling."

Julia introduced Miss Grundeson with a simple statement of the fact which had put an end to Maude's brief time of mourning. Rosa's delight was unbounded when she was introduced to Mrs. Lesley, she expanded as it was her wont to expand on all occasions.

"You can't think how glad I am!" she exclaimed; "for I assure you when I heard of that dreadful event, I felt as if it was quite hard-hearted of me to be happy, and I have been very happy for the last week or so. In point of fact," she added, in a whisper, shrugging at the hotes of a very light glove in evident embarrassment, "I'm engaged to be married!"

"Indeed! Julia said, quietly.

"Yes. You see as par has long objected to my running after public characters, and of course running after Captain Grundeson is one of the most public characters to him; so when Mr. Lowther, Mr. Roderick Lowther, you know—proposed, par happened to be in a good temper, it was all settled immediately."

She then mentioned that Roderick had promised to eat dinner with them.

"He doesn't want to see Mrs. Tredethlyn, you know," she said; "he was only anxious to express to your poor dear, for I am sure you must, of course, now he hasn't any occasion to be sorry, thank goodness!—but you don't mind his coming to tea, do you, dear? I'm such a bad nurse at waiting for me, and I'm going to take him on to the Haymarket. And I like to get used to him a little before our marriage; and I'm to be introduced to a maiden aunt of Roderick's, from whom he has expectations, and I'm so nervous about that. I'm to be introduced this very afternoon," added Rosa.

While she was chattering the door opened, and a servant announced Mr. Lowther. He came out of the bright white daylight on the staircase into the room, which was kept cool and shady by closed Venetian shutters. As he looked about him, unaccustomed to the chiaroscuro, he heard a footfall, and a woman's voice, and saw sitting with her back to the window, started suddenly from her chair.

"Robert!" she cried; "Robert, is it you?" and then she sank down again, pale and breathless.

"Robert!" exclaimed Roderick Lowther. "You must mistake Mr. Lowther for some one else, Mrs. Lesley. His name is not Robert."

"Perhaps not," Susan answered sadly. "He kept his real name a secret from the poor girl who was once proud to call herself his wife; but whatever his name may be, he is my husband nevertheless, and Providence has brought about our meeting to-day. Oh, don't call a falsehood to the wrong you have done me!" she cried, speaking to Roderick Lowther, who stood, pale and confounded, with the face of the nurse women all turned towards him, and with the knowledge that those cumbering eyes were upon him. "I shall claim very little of you. I only want you to give me the name I have a right to bear—I only want you to acknowledge you are—"

Roderick Lowther did not reply to this appeal. After a moment's pause he turned to Julia:

"Where do you pick up your acquaintance, Miss Desmond?" he said. "I should scarcely have expected to meet this lady here."

"This lady is my husband's cousin," answered Maude, who had entered the room while he was speaking; "and I do not know any one who has a better right to be here. What is the matter, Susy, darling?"

"There's nothing that can be spoken of here," Susan answered; "I have met some one whom I have expected to see again. I will rest till my cousin Francis comes back. I will say no more till then."

"But, good gracious me!" exclaimed Miss Grunderson, "I'm not going to be treated in this sort of way. What does it all mean, Roderick? That lady seems to be all of a sudden and calls you her husband, and then says she'll wait till her cousin comes home. I can't be expected to wait under such circumstances. I can't take matters so coolly. With my feelings ordered end all! I must and will have an explanation!"

"You shall, Rosa; but for mercy's sake hold your tongue. There is some infernal mistake. You don't suppose I have never mind about the earrings to-day. If this lady mistakes me for some one she knows, or has a claim upon, I have no doubt I shall be able to demonstrate her mistake, if I can talk to her for a few minutes quietly. And now let me take you to your carriage, Rosa."

Miss Grundeson would have resisted such a summary way of disposing of her and her wrongs, but Roderick Lowther was firm. He led her down stairs, helped her into her carriage, and his last words to her were a cordially to the effect that he would be engaged for his temporary care, to be sent to Mr. Grundeson.

"Awkward," he muttered, as he went back to the drawing-room; "awkward as it may be happen awkwardly just when a fellow fancies he's swimming with the tide all in his favor."

He locked very pale when he went to Mrs. Tredethlyn's morning-room to demand an interview with Susan; but he looked a great deal more grave than pale when the door and last interview, and made his way back to his brother's lodgings.

He found Harcourt with the slim foreign bottle in the table by his side.

"What is the matter with you?" asked the younger brother.

"There is this much the matter with me," answered Roderick: "I trusted a fellow to help me in a difficulty, and he has been mean enough to think that he took advantage of my confidence to get me into a dilemma that it will take me all my life to get out of. I have seen Susan Turner to-day."

"Indeed."

"And she has told me something about the registrar. Do you remember what I asked you to do for me, Harcourt?"

"Perfectly well. And I have got the letter containing your request in my possession—such a nice letter! You tell me in that letter you have taken a bond and vow to live with a little country girl, too poor and insignificant to be your wife, too ignorant to be your companion, and only to engage some clever scapegrace to enact the registrar, hire a parlor in some obscure street, near a registrar's office, and see that everything is there—the sermony could be got over quickly, if the fellow engaged to personate the registrar knew what he was about. The fine bold girl would ask for no certificate, and the dear little girl's witnesses must be conveniently shut up if they made their noses unpleasantly conspicuous."

"I begin to understand you," said Roderick, with expressive gravity.

"Let me tell you that, as you never in your life did a generous thing for me, it wasn't very likely that I should go out of my way to help a bubble. I didn't wish to be too disobliging, so I arranged a marriage, but it was a real and not a sham one. I found a fellow who was glad to your pretty little wife as if the business had been transacted at St. George's, Hanover Square."

"Is this true?" Roderick demanded of Mr. Lowther, coolly. "And I am very happy to tell you that your own pretty little plans are frustrated by the fact that Francis Tredethlyn did not sail in the Kingfisher."

Harcourt made a start of surprise, but his countenance did not express profound vexation. The schemer had failed so completely, that it answered very little to him what courses events took.

"Yes, Francis Tredethlyn is alive and well, I have received a letter from him," he said. "And my little Susy turns out to be Francis Tredethlyn's first cousin."

"Then the likeness which I fancied I saw in that portrait, and the similarity of names, were not mere coincidence after all," muttered Harcourt. And the lady at Petersham is my little sister-in-law. It's pity you didn't trust her rather better," he added, aloud. "Such a relationship could afford to give her a handsome fortune, if he pleased. It is from her father that he inherits his money; and if you had followed your marriage, and made things square with the old man, your wife need not have been disinherited, and would have been sure to make a prize as a widow-woman."

"Looking at it in any way, Rosa was a nuisance," said Mr. Lowther, as he hedowed his moustache with the little comb which the luxurious Metropolitan provides for its guests; "and perhaps it's better so it is."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

MAUDE left Paddington by an afternoon express.

The coach put her down before the Crown Inn, and she walked to Trevedale, high above the town, with the great gate of the marquis' enchanted castle frowning upon her from the top of the hill. She inquired about a conveyance to take her on to Trede hlyn Grange; and the landlord of the Crown ordered the immediate preparation of a lumbering old equipage of a two-like character, lined with washed-out chintz, which was brought forth on rare occasions, and charged for at a prodigious rate. The way seemed intolerably long to her; but at last she saw a gray spot against the blue sky. The grey spot grew bigger and bigger against the horizon, until it grew at last into a dreary-looking habitation, with quaint old gables and moss-grown stone walls.

Maude looked hopelessly at the quiet house—so little sign of occupation, so little token of life.

"He can't be there," she thought. "I am too late!"

She brushed away her tears, drew down her veil, and alighted, telling the driver to wait for her. She was not quite sure if the house was opened by a tall gaunt woman, who had evidently been disturbed by the unwonted sound of wheels on the rough agricultural road.

"Mr. Tredethlyn has been staying here, has he not?" Maude asked, eagerly.

"Yes, and he's here still. Excuse me for being a little put out like, but you have taken me so aback. You don't happen to be my master's wife, do you?"

"Yes, yes. Oh, thank heaven he is still here! Let me see him at once, please!" exclaimed Maude, trying to pass the grim-looking woman, who barred her passage.

"Not yet! no, please, ma'am, not yet!" cried the woman, eagerly. "It mightn't be safe."

"Not safe! What do you mean?"

"He has been ill, ma'am; and the doctor's special orders was to be kept from anything that might upset him. And he talked and raved so about you, poor dear, when his senses were quite gone, as they were for weeks together; and I'm sure nothing could upset him more much as the sight of your coming upon him sudden. Let me see him first, and tell him you are here. I make no doubt he'll be overjoyed to see you; but it mustn't come like a shock upon him."

"He has been ill!" cried Maude; dangerously ill!"

"Yes, ma'am; very dangerously. We had two doctors with him at one time. Brain-fever it was—fever-fatigue and trouble of the mind, and so on, the doctors said. He came up here after being three days in a wherry, by which he was to have gone abroad; and he came in a state everything about the farm and the quarries, and so on; and everything was almost settled when a steamer one morning had in his head, and after that got from bed to worse, until his life was almost give up!"

"But he is out of danger now?"

"Yes, ma'am, thank God, quite out of danger now; but, oh, as weak; the smallest child that ever I had to do with wasn't weaker than my poor master now."

Maude burst out crying.

"Don't scream me," she exclaimed, as the gaunt woman made a clumsy attempt to comfort her: "I am crying for joy. Go and tell my husband that I am here; but pick as say based. I will be very patient. Thank God that I am found him! Thank God I shall be able to fall on my knees by his bedside and beg his forgiveness for my neglect and ingratitude.

The woman looked wonderingly at this butterfly-creature who talked hysterically of falling at her husband's feet and begging forgiveness. Her manners had made no confidants in that Cornish house.

"If you'll walk in there, ma'am," Martha said, "I'll go and tell my master sister."

It seemed a long time that she waited, and then Mrs. Drysoll returned, smiling grimly this time.

"He'll see you directly minute," she said; "but he's very low, and he seem so pleased, poor dear!"

She led Maude to the top of the staircase, and then pointed to a half-opened door at the end of a corridor, after which she left Mrs. Tredethlyn again, and Maude heard her sobbing quietly to herself until the sound subsided in the distance.

She opened the door on the half-open door, and entered the room in which her husband lay on a white-curtained bed, very pale, very wan, very thin. She took her veil and raise his hand to offer it to her in token of reconciliation. She felt the weakness of the hand, and held her cheek upon the hand that was too weak to be lifted.

"Oh, forgive me!" she said; "may day my love, you have not punished him. If you wanted to give me a lesson, you have given me a very cruel one; but you have taught me that I cannot live without you."

She sat by his pillow with his weak head encircled by her caressing arms, and told him the story of her wanderings and repentance. It was a sweet exchange of forgiveness for the past, and tender promises for the future.

After dinner she wrote the brief notes—one to her maid at Falmouth, who was to follow her mistress's luggage to the portmanteau; the other to Julia, who was to send her such things as would be necessary to her in a stay of some weeks.

Then she sat by her husband's bed once more to do hunt to nurse her husband through the slow stages of convalescence. It was very long before he was strong enough to get up to a little Arcadian tea-drinking. It was very long after that before he was able to take a few turns in the delightful, lonely garden. But Maude was still longer before he was well enough to think of leaving the house in Cornwall, and to plunge into busy common-place life again.

Hidden among those wild Cornish moors, the husband and wife were busy together—improving their minds; for Maude had confessed to her husband, with a good deal of girlish giggling and blushing, that her own education had been very nearly as defective as his, and that the wide fields of knowledge, which were such strange and unexplored regions to him, were scarcely more familiar to her.

They were very happy together. If Francis read in real earnest, and his wife only played at reading, they were not the less united in their studies. The industrious honey-bee and the frivolous butterfly may hover about the same flower, happy according to their different natures in the same summer-scene. Francis Tredethlyn and his wife were so happy in the quiet old farmhouse that they let the autumn days drift by them in their monotonal retreat, even after the Cornishman had grown strong enough for a new skirmish with Harcourt Lowther, had there been any need of a physical contest between the two.

After this, need it be said that all went very smoothly with Mr. and Mrs. Tredethlyn—so smoothly, that poor discontented Julia abandoned the happy couple in disgust, and went abroad as traveling companion to a rheumatic old countess who leads here dreadful life, and insists upon being read to sleep out of German metaphysical works at wierd hours of the night. She has met with Roderick Lowther in the course of her travels—lonely, and cynical, looking at every thing in life through the medium of his own disappointments.

They are very happy, Francis and Maude. They are very happy, as time speeds on, there appears upon the lawn in Berkshire a little rolling bundle of white muslin and expansive lace, which, inspected closely, turns out to be a baby, and which, if it could speak at all, would answer to the name of Lionel Hillary Tredethlyn, and by-and-by, when the young couple travel in the bright autumn weather, a prim English nurse, and a French bonne follow in their rear, and there is a little girl baby in a white hood, and papa and mamma are alike concerned for the safe conveyance of these domestic treasures. The girl baby is called Maude; but she owns a string of other names; and her two godmothers are Susan Lowther, who lives happily with her boy in the Petersham cottage, and Rosa Grimbleson, who declares that, in consequence of the distracting influence of public characters, and her fatal experience of the perfidy of private individuals, in the person of Roderick Lowther, will descend a spinster to the grave.

One day, at a German watering-place, they hear of a man living in the same hotel with them, their country-man—a man who is young, and has been handsome, and who for the last few months has been conspicuous in the gaming-saloons of the Kursaal as a desperate, and sometimes very lucky player—an inventor, who can scarcely be an adventurer, for he has been admired and caressed by elegant women and well-born men, but who has been a hard drinker from first to last, and within the last fortnight has fallen a victim to the most hideous disease which vice ever engendered as the scorpion-whip to work its own retribution—disease called delirium tremens.

It scarcely needs Maude's appealing look to inspire Francis with the wish to help this unhappy countryman.

He has spoken to the landlord he tells her, when he comes back and has given him a cheque, which is to keep things smooth for the present; and has promised more money if more should be needed; for in any case the Englishman is not to be worried about money matters while he is ill; and above all he is not to know that a stranger's help has saved him from annoyance.

It was a week after this when Mr. and Mrs. Tredethlyn left the German watering-place. They were on the point of starting from the hotel when Maude noticed the closed shutters of some windows on an upper story, and, on questioning one of the waiters, was told that the Englishman was dead. She asked her husband to tell her more about the painful end of this lonely Englishman, as they sat alone in the coupé of a railway carriage.

"Yes, he is dead, Maude!" Francis answered, sadly. "It was a very melancholy fate. The doctors could not conquer the sleeplessness, and he sank at last into a state of coma from which he never rallied. It was a very miserable ending. He will be buried in the little Protestant cemetery. I left all necessary directions, and I have written to his friends in England. Perhaps some one will come over to stand beside his grave. He was no friend of mine, but there seems something very shocking in this solitary death in a strange country."

"He was no friend of yours!" repeated Maude, wonderingly. "how can you say that, Frank? You knew him then."

"Yes, Maude, and you know him, too. The man who died last night was Harcourt Lowther."

THE END.

TORNADO IN WISCONSIN

Terrible Loss of Life and great Destruction of Property.

The village of Viroqua, the county seat of Vernon county Wisconsin, 80 miles north-east from the city of [illegible] was [illegible]

noon of Wednesday, June 28th, 1865, by a tornado which, in two minutes, killed 1 persons, entirely demolished 36 houses, 13 barns, three stores and several shops, partly destroyed 43 other buildings and places of business, wounded over 100 persons, and inflicted damage to property to the amount of nearly half a million dollars. The village contained about 1,200 inhabitants, mostly from the eastern states, and was one of the most thrifty and beautiful inland villages of Wisconsin. It is situated in the midst of a rich farming country, where, as far as the eye can reach, can be seen growing crops, white farm-houses and droves of cattle.

The southern portion of the village was the home of the wealthier part of the business men, where taste, labor and money had built up beautiful homes.

At 4 o'clock Wednesday afternoon, the most terrific and irresistible storm of wind ever chronicled in the United States came up. There was neither rain, thunder or lightning at the time. There was seen coming from the north-east a column of wind, dust, and fragments of limbs, passing south-west in a line which would strike Viroqua in a mile at the same moment another and larger blacker cloud, rolling close to the ground was seen coming from the west, taking in its course the southern part of the village. People ran to their homes in terror. The two columns met a short distance west of the village, where the work of destruction began. The current from the west was the strongest, and carried the one from the north-east—the united tornado continuing east, laying in ruins a strip of country 80 rods wide and 14 miles long.

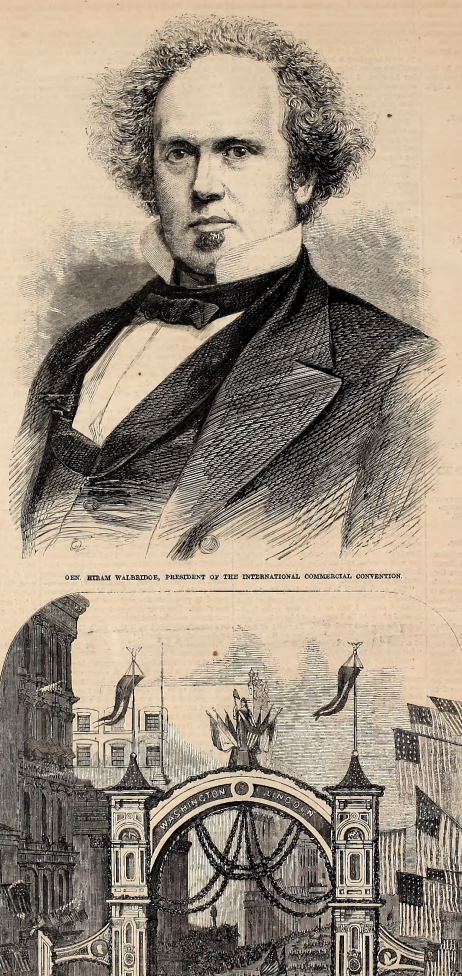
Houses were lifted a hundred feet in the air, dashed to the earth, torn to fragments, the buildings, inmates and contents, whirled in every conceivable direction. Oak trees, 20 inches through, were snapped off like pipe-stems. Rocks 12 feet square were lifted and carried 40 rods.

A school-house, containing 24 children and a teacher, was taken many feet into the air—at struck the ground several rods from its foundation—was taken up again and dashed into fragments—eight children instantly killed, and all in the building more or less wounded.

The county, for miles, is covered with debris of this, the greatest storm ever known in this country.

ALLEGORICAL REPRESENTATION OF NEPTUNE.

Among the many ingenious devices for display upon the anniversary of our National Independence just passed, was an allegorical representation of Neptune, at Schenectady, N.Y. This ingenious feature of the day's celebration was designed by William J. Van Heusen, and was displayed in the grand procession which took place on the 4th in Schenectady, by Neptune Engine Company No. 4 of that city. The piece may be briefly described as follows:—In a large nautilus shell, fluted and scalloped, covered with silver, sat Neptune, apparently in a half nude state, with green silk skirt, trimmed with silver fringe and lace, with a natural shell belt about his waist—on his head a golden crown studded with stars and jewels. He wore a long, white beard and hair, and carried a golden trident. The shell at the base was supported by waves curiously centered, which were in motion on the shore, as it were. There were strewn about a large number of shells and sea grass. The whole was resting on an immense shell shaped dais, imitating the ocean beach, the lower edge bordered with silver, scalloped and in fanciful shapes trimmed with grass and flowers. On each side below hung in folds a curtain trimmed with silver lace, studded with stars and other fanciful ornaments.



FOURTH OF JULY TRIUMPHAL ARCH

In Cincinnati, Ohio.

THE anniversary of our National independence was celebrated this year in Cincinnati with more than usual enthusiasm. Most of the principal thoroughfares of the city were elaborately decked with flags and patriotic devices emblematic of the spirit of the people. One of the principal features of the day was the grand triumphal arch over Vine street, an illustration of which we present this week

BROOKLYN NAVY YARD.

We present this week an illustration of one of the principal points of interest in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, showing the iron pen now of the rebel ram Mississippi, sunk by Admiral Farragut a few hours before the capture of New Orleans; also the rebel torpedo boat Midge, taken at Charleston after the city was evacuated by the rebels. The monument appearing in the view is of beautiful design, built of white marble, and was erected in memory of the sailors and marines who fell at the capture of Barrier Fort, china. The cannon are those captured in Mexico, and brought to New York after the war with that country.

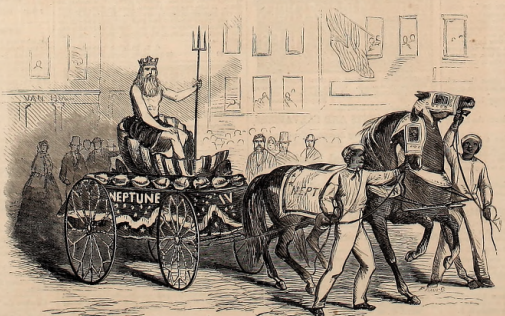
GENERAL APPEARANCE OF THE COUNTRY AFTER THE TORNADO, SHOWING THE TRACK OF THE STORM, AND ITS TERRIBLE EFFECTS.

GEN. HIRAM WALBRIDGE.

GEN. HIRAM WALBRIDGE, whose portrait we present this week, has for several years been so prominently before the public that his name has grown to be familiar in nearly every social and political circle. As a proof of his popularity, we may instance that when his name was suggested for President of the international Commercial Convention, recently held at Detroit, he was unanimously chosen for that arduous and responsible position. The subject of our sketch was born in Ithica, Themphins county, New York, February 2, 1811. He began life by learning the trade of a mechanic, but subsequently, desiring an academic education, he entered the Ohio University, where he graduated with more than the usual honors. When twenty-three years of age he was commissioned Brigadier General of the Ohio State Militia. Soon after he removed to New York city, where he was elected a Representative in Congress, serving from 1851 to 1853. Unlike many politicians, Gen. Walbridge takes a great and active interest in the commercial prosperity of his country, as his labors at the Chamber of Commerce and Produce Exchange of New York sufficiently testify. In person, Gen. Walbridge is a little above the medium height, and of a commanding figure, which is much enhanced by the bonhomie of his manners. As a speaker, he is very fluent, and happy in reconciling conflicting elements, a faculty which came admirably into play during the convention at Detroit.



I HOLD myself indebted to any one from whose enlightened understanding another ray of knowledge is communicated to mine. To inform the mind is to correct and to enlarge the heart.

A NEW CURE FOR HYDROPHOBIA.

DR. BUISSON, of Paris, was lately called in to treat a woman who had been seized with hydrophobia, and in whom the disease had reached its final crisis. Having bled the patient, he wiped his hands with a cloth moistened with the saliva of the dying person. On the forefinger of the left hand he had a trifling wound, with the skin broken. He at once perceived his imprudence, but, trusting to the method of cure lately discovered by him, he was satisfied with washing it in water.

"Thinking," says, M. Buisson, "that the malady would not declare itself before the fortieth day, and having many patients to visit, I put off taking my remedy of vapor baths from one day to another. On the ninth day, being in my closet, I felt all at once a pain in my throat, and one yet more keen in my eyes; my body felt so light that I thought, if I jumped, I could rise to a prodigious height, or that, if I threw myself from the window, I should be able to float in the air; the hairs of my head were so sensitive that it seemed to me as if, without seeing them, I could have counted them; saliva rose continually in my mouth; contact with external air caused me frightful pain, and I shunned looking at anything bright; I had an incessant longing to run after and bite, not men, but animals and even objects about me; I drank with difficulty, and I may mention that the sight of water tried me more than the pain in my throat; I believe that by shutting the eyes every one with hydrophobia may always drink. An attack came on every five minutes, and I observed that the pain began in the forefingers and stretched along the nerves of the shoulder. Thinking that my system was only preservative, not curative, in its nature, I took a vapor bath, with the intension, not of healing, but of suffocating myself. When the bath was at a heat of 32 degrees centigrade, all the symptoms disappeared as if by enchantment, and I have felt nothing of them since. I have treated more than 80 persons who have been bitten by animals in a state of madness, and all have been saved by this method."

When a person has been bitten by a mad dog, he should be made to take seven of the so-called Russian vapor baths, from 27 degrees to 63 degrees centigrade hot, one every day, by way of preventive. In case of the malady having distinctly shown itself, the vapor bath should be heated rapidly to 27 degrees centigrade, then slowly to 63 degrees. The patient should strictly confine himself to his room until he is quite well. Dr. Baisch mentions some other curious facts: A man in San Jacinto was bitten by a rattlesnake, about 15 miles from home. Wishing to die in the bosom of his family, he ran home, w nt to bed, perspired plentifully, and the wound healed like a simple sore. The bite of the tarantula is healed by dancing, the virus being dissipated by perspiration. If an infant, who has been vaccinated, is made to take a vapor bath, the vaccination is of no effect.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

Ir has been observed that to-and two make four—but what for?

Ir has been frequently argued that three twos make six; but then a rough sea voyage will do the same.

The conjunction of four and constitutes eight; but the union of a couple is not always productive of love.

"Mr. dear," said Mrs. Bumble to her daughter, "you must make something warm round you in the carriage. Miss B. mentioned the request of her mother to her beau, and he immediately began to feel it, by placing his arm round the young lady's waist.

They say children's method of giving a dog a leg to your feelings is to send her a look of your hair.

A young friend of ours, whose opinions deserve a share of influence from the large fee he pays save that although it is quite true that "one swallow does not make a summer," a summer like this makes one a swallow—a good deal of liquid.

A distinguished California divine was asked after a long prayer, "Any more, lad, what he thought of the century." He replied: "There are but three things at Washington—lobbying, little manes and grog shops; in their words, opiate holes, gopher holes and boiler holes."

A drunkard leaning against a church railing, replied, in answer to a question from the sexton, that he quit worship, being to that church, but he was coming that way.

"Mamma, why did you kiss your hand to the gentleman opposite, this morning?" said a careful mother to her chattering daughter. "Why, my dear creature, had the impudence to blow a kiss clear across the street, and of course I threw it back again, of course. Yes, would not have me encourage him by keeping it, would you?"

Cockney Zoology.—Precocious young lady —Law, me, here's a beagle." Mamma (reproachfully) "A beagle! my dear, you ignorant girl! It is a bee!" Keeper of the menagerie (respectfully): "Axe parding, mum, but it ain't."

A young widow of very polite address, whose husband had lately died, was visited soon after by her relations, friends, parish, by inquiries, at once, about her husband's health, when she replied, with a pleasant smile, "Why, I dead yet."

For the gout, toast and water: for bile, cucumber for corns, soap: for rheumatism, flannel and patience: for the tooth-ache, pack it out: for debt, industry: and for love, matrimony.

A very sad, convivial lawyer being in his early years much addicted to dissipation, his mother advised him to get a couple of a quiet disposition and consistent food was hecka, and his drink water. "What, Madam," said he, "would you have me imitate a man who eats like a beast and drinks like a fish?"

Domestic Magazines.—Wives who are always knowing the contents.

Wanted for Chemical Purposes.—A lady dissolved in tears.

A French priest, who had usually a small congregation, saw one day preaching at the church in his village, when, the doors being open, a gander and several geese walked in. He stopped preaching for a moment, looking at the unbidden guests, and then observed, in a tone no longer familiar with the people of his district: "I perceive my ordinary hearers are not here; they did not come themselves, they sent their representatives.

A man in the United States service is now called a "brevet-horse."

"Nobody ever lost anything by love," said a sage-looking parson.

"That is not true," said a young lady, who heard the remark, "for I once lost three night's sleep."

If you want to kindle the flame of love in a lady's breast, you must spark her till she is eager for a match.

Why is the assessor of taxes the best man in the world?—Because he never underrates anybody.

A paper calling newspapers at a reliney station, was calling on Saturday evening, "To-day's Times, yesterday's sun—which a passenger wishing for a witticism, cried out, "What's the use of to-day's Press? Till give you a shilling for to-morrow's All the Year," immediately handed him the Sunday Times! The passenger seemed to give more than his money's worth, the fellow-travelers made him keep his word, and give the sharp-witted lad a shilling.

A boy, whose honesty is more to be commended than his ingenuity, once took some butter to a gentleman in a neighboring village. The latter having a very nice appearance, and the gentleman being desirous of purchasing such for his own use, invited the boy to bring him all the butter his mother had to spare. "I think," said the boy, "she can't spare any more, for she said she would not have spared this, only a rat fell into the cream and she did not like to waste it in her sorrow."

At a circus, a woman jumps clean through hoops. In society they jump into them and stick there.

The beautiful tresses of young ladies are now called hair-raising.

Lies are hilless swords, which cut the hands that wield them.

Sir Walter Scott, in lending a book one day to a friend, cautioned him to be punctual in returning it. "This is really necessary," said the poet, in apology, "for though all my friends are honest gentlemen, I observe almost all of them to be good bookkeepers."

A man of wit once said, rightly enough, "He who feels a good conscience gains a son—he who finds a bad one, loses a daughter."

The new moon reminds one of a giddy girl, because she don't much reflected.

Why is it very foolish to nap in a railway carriage?—Because the train always runs over sleepers.

How the Soldiers' Money Goes.
The honorable earnings of the soldiers are expended in a manner worthy of their public spirit and domestic virtue. They are investing millions in the government loan, and it is significant that while the sale of sewing machines for domestic purposes has fallen off with the contracts of army clothing, the sale of the Wheeler & Wilson machine, the family one as well as the gallant soldiers have not forgotten to secure it in their outfit, is greater than ever before. Call at the Salesroom, 625 Broadway, to investigate the merits of the machine. The is a good investment. The manager of a large army office has the machine in use. A trial of the wife has a Wheeler & Wilson sewing machine.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.
THIRD SERIES.
$230,000,000!
By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the Third Series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum. Known as the Seven-Thirty Loan.
These Notes are issued under date of July 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that date, in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into
U. S. 5-20 Six per cent.
GOLD-BEARING BONDS.
These bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum, to their value, according to the rule levied upon their property. The interest is payable semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.
The interest at 7-30 per cent amounts to
One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents " " " $100 "
Ten " " " $500 "
20 " " " $1,000 "
$3 " " " $5,000 "
Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscription.
The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirty Notes of the two previous issues, except reference to itself the option of paying interest in gold each 6 per cent. instead of 7-30 in currency. The Secretary will declare the interest in currency up to July 15th, at the time when they mature.
The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-thirties will commence on the 1st of June, and will be made promptly on receipt of subscriptions.
The slight change made in the conditions of this Third Series affords only the strongest security to the holder. The principal is made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.
The right is reserved to close the list, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices, that experience would be the best test. In any event, will be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent in currency.
THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET
now offered by the Government, and its superior advantages will make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.
Less than $230,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress now remain to be issued. Said amount at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as is now being born the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.
Subscriptions in every part of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive the money.

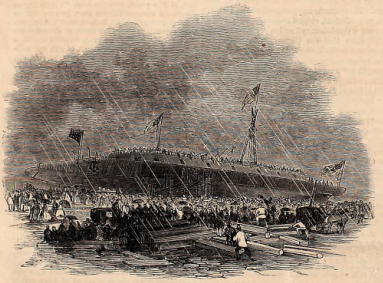
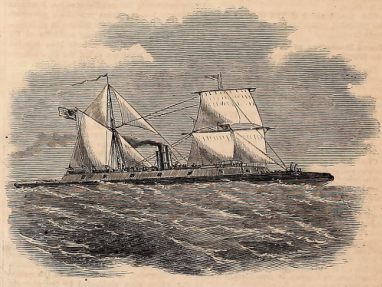
FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.



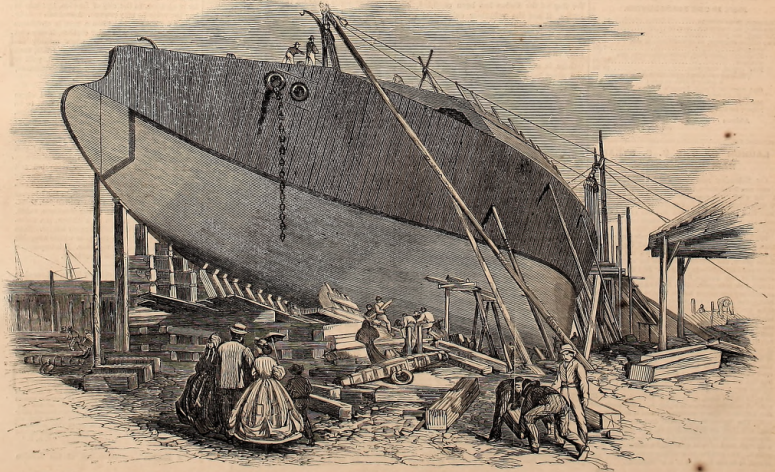
No. 514—Vol. XX.] NEW YORK, AUGUST 5, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. OR WEEKS $1 00.

Representation.



THERE are about 4,000,000 of negroes, lately slaves, in the southern states. Formerly three-fifths of these were enumerated in fixing the basis of representation in Congress. Now all must be counted. The ratio of representation, as fixed by the last census was one member to every 124,000 inhabitants. So that the negro population will be represented in Congress by 33 members instead of 20 as before. In other words, the south, black and white, will gain 13 members. But who will these 33 members represent? If the negroes do not vote, they cannot claim to represent the negroes! Who then do they represent? Nobody! Is that republicanism?

"But," says our copperhead friend, "the whites vote!" Precisely; and so long as the negroes have no voice in the matter, the southern whites will have 33 more votes in Congress, than an equal number of northern whites! Now, friend, is that republicanism? Is it fair? Practically it is equivalent to giving each southern white voter about double the political power possessed by the northern voter. The rebel soldier who stood guard over you at Libby has only to go home, take that remarkably easy dose for rebel stomachs, the amnesty proclamation, and forthwith his vote counts nearly double what yours does in determining the affairs of the nation in Congress or in the election of President.



See how the thing works. South Carolina has a population of 291,000 whites, and 402,000 blacks. Under the old representation she had only four members of Congress. She will now have six, all to be elected by the voters in the white population of 291,000, which amount to about 48,000. That is to say there will be one member of Congress to each 8,000 voters.

Now the State of Vermont has a white population of 315,000, or 24,000 more than South Carolina, and yet she has only three members of Congress to South Carolina's six. In Vermont there is one member of Congress to 21,000 voters; in South Carolina one to 8,000. A white-washed rebel's vote in the latter state is, therefore, equal to two and one-half votes of loyal men in the northern states—for the same proportion holds true throughout all the northern states as in Vermont.

And this must remain so as long as the negro is denied the right of voting for the men who represent him in Congress. It seems that this is a matter of some concern to the northern voter.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS
FRANK LESLIE'S
Chimney Corner.

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold
Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received to it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of The Chimney Corner was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should posses this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

The Chimney Corner is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

LAUNCH OF THE U. S. STEAM RAM DUNDERBERG.

On Saturday morning, July 22d, the U. S. steam ram Dunderberg, the largest war ship of the kind in the world, was successfully launched from W. H. Webb's shipyard, at the foot of Sixth street, East river, New York city. The occasion was one of more than ordinary interest, and our artist has faithfully portrayed this monarch of the ocean.

The Dunderberg is an iron-clad frigate ram of 7,000 tons displacement, and was constructed especially for sea-going purposes. She has two engines of 5,000 actual horse power, and her contract calls for a speed of 15 knots per hour, ordinary steaming. Her armament will consist of four 15-inch Rodman's, and from 12 to 14 11-inch Dahlgren guns. It is not within the limits of an ordinary newspaper article to give such a detailed description of this vessel as her magnitude and importance would seem to demand, but we will endeavor briefly to give some of the main features of this great and powerful ship. The principal dimensions of the hull are as follows: Length, 380 feet 4 inches; beam, 72 feet 10 inches; depth of hold, 22 feet 7 inches; height of casemate inside, 7 feet 9 inches; length of ram bow, 50 feet. Her draft, when ready for sea, will be 21 feet. Her displacement is 7,000 tons. Registered tonnage, 5,090 tons. The iron armor will weigh about 1,000 tons. She has six main and two donkey boilers; the main boilers are 18 feet deep, 17 feet 6 inches in height, and 21 feet 5 inches front, and together will weigh about 450 tons. The boiler surface is 30,000 feet; the grate surface 1,200 feet. The condensing surface is 12,000 square feet. The engines are horizontal back action condensing, with two 100-inch cylinders, and 45-inch stroke of piston. The propeller is 21 feet in diameter, and has a varying pitch of from 27 to 30 feet, and weighs 34,580 pounds. The coal bunkers will accommodate 1,000 tons of coal, sufficient for 10 to 13 days' steaming.

CAUTION!

We would respectfully caution the public and our subscribers in the Western States against a woman styling herself Mrs. O. Loomis, who is in the habit of collecting subscriptions and receiving money for Patterns, etc. She is an impostor. We have no traveling agents.

A Pair of Provisional Governors.

In carrying out his plan of re-organizing or reconstructing the rebellious states, President Johnson has appointed provisional governors in all of them—men, we believe, in all instances, either natives or long residents of the respective states. They have been selected from among what are called the loyal citizens of these states. If we may judge from their utterances, their speeches and proclamations, we can only ejaculate, "angels and ministers of grace defend us" from such loyalty! It seem to us there is little to choose between the provisional governors and the rebel incumbents they displaced. Mr. B. F. Perry has been appointed provisional governor of South Carolina. How much there is to choose between him and the fire-eating Magrath, his predecessor, may be gathered from the following choice passages from a speech made by him at Greenville, on the 3d of July. Throughout his speech this loyal governor speaks of the south as his "country," and its people as of a community conquered by foreigners, and held by brute force. "We meet," he says, at the outset, "as a disgraced and subjugated people, to petition the conqueror to restore our lost rights!" No expression of love for the Union, no sympathy for the efforts made to preserve our nationality, no inculcation of the principles which were vindicated by the struggle, escape from this chosen leader in the experiment of "reconstruction." On the contrary, this "one in ten thousand and altogether lovely," of South Carolina loyalists, to whom the flag of the Union has been confided, becomes, if not the volunteer eulogist of treason, at any rate the eulogist of traitors. To his mind, the two greatest men ever produced in the United States, are Washington and Gen. Lee. "In all history," such are his words, "there is not a more perfect model of a pure and great man (save Washington) than Gen. Lee!" Why did not this loyal governor add Jeff. Davis? When one's hand is in, why not do the dirty business of glorifying traitors thoroughly? Let us, however, go on with our extracts from Mr. Perry's speech. The astonished reader will supply his own comments and exclamations:

"There is not now in the southern states any one who feels more bitterly the humiliation and degradation of going back into the Union than I do."

"I have no doubt, in nine cases out of ten, freedom will prove a curse instead of a blessing to the negro."

"It is to be hoped that in a very short time civil government will be restored in South Carolina; that law once more will reign supreme over the state, and that life liberty and property will be protected everywhere, as they heretofore have been."

"Treason may be committed against the state of South Carolina as well as against the United States. After South Carolina left the Union all her citizens were liable, as traitors, in the state courts, who took sides with the United States and fought against her."

"The secession of eleven or twelve sovereign states, composing one-half of the territory of the United States, was something more than a rebellion. It was legitimate war between the two sections, and they acted towards each other, throughout the war, as recognised belligerents, and were so treated and recognised by foreign nations."

"Whilst I do not think that the whole people of the southern states have behaved well in this war, and done their duty at home and on the field of battle, yet there is a very large proportion of them who have won immortal honors, and whose glory in war and wisdom in council will illustrate many a bright page in history. They have been unsuccessful in their revolution, but this should not, and does not detract from their heroic gallantry on the field of battle, or their statesmanship in the cabinet or halls of legislation. They will be remembered and honored as heroes and patriots, not only at the south, but in the north too, as soon as passion subsides, and sober reason and calm reflection assume their sway over the public mind."

"I cannot and would not, Mr. Chairman, ask my fellow-citizens to forget the past in this war so far as the north is concerned. There have been deeds of atrocity committed by the United States' armies which can never be forgotten in the southern states."

"President Johnson voted for Breckinridge in the Presidential canvass in 1860. Judging, then, from his antecedents, the south should have every hope and confidence in him."

"It has been said, and repeated all over the southern states, that the south has sustained a great loss in the death of President Lincoln. I do not think so. President Johnson is a much abler and firmer man than Lincoln was. He is in every way more acceptable to the south. In the first place, he is a southern man, and Lincoln was a northern man. He is a democrat, and Lincoln was a whig and republican."

After reading these extracts, no one will be surprised to hear Mr. Perry talk of the causes of "our failure," nor yet to hear him point out how it might have been avoided, and the rebellion made successful. Perhaps his suggestions are thrown out for practical use in the next attempt to get rid of the Union—into which Mr. Perry feels it to be so "degrading and humiliating" to come back! He says that Jeff Davis was not altogether to blame "for the failure of the great revolution." The southern Congress was in fault:

"All between the ages of eighteen and forty-five should have been forced into the army and kept there. It mattered not whether he was doctor, lawyer, preacher, politician, editor or school-teacher; if an able-bodied man, he should have been sent to the army."

Of a similar stamp is Mr. Johnson, Provisional Governor of Georgia, in getting whom we have no very great improvement on the late Gov. Brown. This specimen of Georgia loyalty, in his official addresses, constantly talks as if he were not a citizen of the United States. He speaks of war as having existed "between the United States and the South;" refers to the rebel armies as "our armies," and to "the people of the Confederate States," as if they belonged to quite another country. Mr. Hilliard, formerly a representative in Congress from Georgia, is also a "loyalist," in the prevailing very latitudinarian acceptance of the term. He counsels acquiescence in the Union, but, nevertheless, cannot avoid speaking of the defunct "Confederacy" as his "country." It would seem that the United States are to be reannexed to the insurgent states, which for the time being, and pending a recuperation of their strength for a more successful attempt at revolution, will permit us to call the above concern "The Union."

"Reconstruction," with Davis excused, Lee apotheosized, and Lincoln pooh-poohed as "nothing more than clay in the hands of the potter, ready to change his measures and principles at the bidding of his party," is not precisely the thing for which the nation has sacrificed two hundred thousand lives and three thousand millions of treasure!

It is stated that Mr. Bigelow, our Minister in Paris, recently made a communication to the French government, in which he said, as set forth in the Moniteur, the official paper, that:

"We (our government) do not like, of course, to see a monarchy established in Mexico; we prefer, of course, republican institutions. But we respect the will of the people. We can understand how Mexico, that was for a long time ruled by a monarchial government, would like to return to that form of government; and we would not go to war for the sake of a form of government."

No American representative, worthy of the name, could ever use such language, and if Mr. Bigelow did make use of it, unless under express instructions from his government, he ought to be replaced without delay. "Respect the will of the people!" Of course we do; but we respect no government that exists in spite of that will, and only through the force of foreign bayonets. Mr. Bigelow knows—and if he does not, he should be put in some infant school and taught a little about affairs on this continent, that there is not an omnibus load of the people of Mexico in favor of monarchial government. A few native generals, traitors to their country, from selfish considerations, and equally ready to prove traitors to the Franco-Austrian puppet, are all who accept, without protest, the existing order of things. If Mr. Bigelow "can understand" how Mexico, tyrannised over for some centuries by rapacious viceroys, would like to return under their beneficent rule, he can understand more than any one who has ever visited that country, and vastly more than his countrymen. We recommend Mr. Bigelow to read Gen. Prim's letter to the Emperor on this subject, written when the designs of Louis Napoleon on Mexico first developed themselves. The general, after his stay in Mexico, was very far from "understanding" matters in the sense that Mr. Bigelow professes to do. Whoever represents the American people to be anything else than deadly hostile to the French occupation of Mexico, or ready to acquiesce in the establishment of the empire in that country, utterly belies public sentiment. Our representatives wrong the United States, and act with bad faith towards Louis Napoleon in disguising from him, or seeking to disguise from him, the fact that the American people will "go to war for the sake of a form of government," if France persists in her attempts to force an odious system and form on an unwilling people, our friends and allies, in contempt of a principle laid down by our fathers, and to which we are dedicated body and soul.

The Tribune pays the following well-deserved compliment to the "average run" of our city representatives in the State Legislature, apropos of the probable increase of the city representation from seventeen to twenty-odd members:

"Our city sends some good and worthy men to represent her at Albany; but, take the lot as they run, we defy any exaggeration of their rascality or general worthlessness. Double the number—yes, treble it—and it will not be possible to render the average more mercenary, more profligate, more unprincipled and disgraceful, than it has been for the last five or six years. So, bring along your twenty-five or thirty members! After what we have survived from seventeen, we defy depravity to do its worst."

We hear a great deal about the "shiftlessness" of the negro, and sometimes, in view of secession statements, begin to fear that all the freedmen are to be paupers. We feel somewhat relieved, however, when we read, in the official report of the commandant at Mobile:

"During the month of May the number of rations issued to destitute persons at this post was as follows:
To white persons 69,978
To colored persons 11,089
"During the month of June:
To white persons 68,416
To colored persons 8,000
"At the present time the commissary is issuing to destitute white persons at the rate of five thousand five hundred rations daily. To colored persons less than one-tenth of this amount."

The following specimen of fine writing, "slightly mixed" in metaphor, is from the Washington Star: "The apple of discord is now fairly in our midst, and if not nipped in the bud, it will burst forth in a conflagration which will deluge the sea of politics with an earthquake of heresies."

If southern planters prove wise, there is a way in which they can surely turn their loss into a gain—a gain to themselves and to their states. Take Virginia for instance; there is no reason in the world why the farms in that state should not be as valuable as those of her neighbor, Pennsylvania. Yet they are not. According to the census of 1850, there were:

No of acres of	In Virginia.	In Penn.
Improved land in farms	10,360,135	8,626,619
Unimproved	15,792,176	6,294,723

The cash value of farms in Virginia was $8; in Pennsylvania, $25 per acre. Now suppose that, by a change of policy, the farms of Virginia should be made as valuable as those of Pennsylvania, would not that more than make up the losses by the eradication of slavery? But there is no reason, with peace and a proper treatment of working-men, why, in five years, or even less, Virginia farms should not average $25 per acre, just as well as those of Pennsylvania. Indeed, they will become more valuable in time than those of the neighbor state, for Virginia has as great mineral wealth, a finer climate, and a greater area of rich and well-situated lands. No part of Pennsylvania can compare in natural advantages, for farming, with the noble valley of the Shenandoah.—Evening Post.

The negroes must eat, and to eat they must work; and any planter who treats them as free working-men ought to be treated, will find no difficulty in getting workmen, supposing him to have the capital, without which, in the north, no sane man attempts such an enterprise as carrying on a large farm.

A general election is coming off in England, and will be signalized by the usual corruption and disturbance. No American can comprehend the disorder and outrage attending the British elections. The "old times" in the Sixth Ward were "child's play" as compared with them. We learn, by the last mail, that at Nottingham, two would-be-members proposed to address their enlightened fellow-citizens. When the trains arrived with delegations, from the neighboring towns, they were set upon by a mob and driven back into the station. The candidates did not dare to make their appearance, the processions of town voters were pelted with stones, the flags torn down and scaffoldings burned—police powerless—military sent for—fight kept up till midnight—fifteen persons dangerously injured and great numbers maimed. Baron Rothschild, who presents himself for re-election, to the city of London, has only to buy the votes he may require. A seat can usually be had for £20,000, but when a man is ambitious to represent some particular locality, it may cost him £100,000. Wilberforce, when making his long and hard fight against the slave trade, then a very profitable business in England, paid at times as much as £200,000 for a seat in Parliament, that he might carry on the battle.

Slavery produces an aristocracy; and where slavery and aristocracy exist labor is held to be ignoble. Hence the notorious ignorance, indolence and shiftlessness of the poor whites all over what have been the slave states—their condition of brutal and proud poverty and vagabondism. The only manner in which the victims of this condition can be rescued from their semi-savage habits of life is to make labor respected and respectable. This cannot be effected except by lifting up those who have been the laborers heretofore, and must, to a great extent, be the laborers still at the south. Every wise movement, therefore, to better the estate of the freedman, teach, protect and respect him as a citizen, is a movement also towards uplifting the poor whites. Make the colored people and the poor whites amicable rivals and they will rise together. It is impossible to advance their interests separately.

A young lady of the old Bay State, affianced to a hero at the front, tried long and earnestly to get to his side, and have that rite solemnized that should give her the right to share the lot of the hero aforesaid. But red tape, or "military necessity," or something else prevented. She could not get to her hero, and her hero could not get leave of absence to come to her. So she appealed to Governor Andrew, he of the Tender Heart, who straightway wrote as follows to the great War Dragon in Washington. Need we add that the appeal was responded to speedily and favorably, and with Mr. Stanton's proverbial grace?

"To the Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War—This case appeals to all our sympathies as patriots and as gentlemen, and I appeal to the chivalry of the Department of War, which presides over more heroes than Homer ever dreamed of, and better and braver than his muse ever sung—I pray you to grant this request of my fair correspondent, and generations will rise up and call us blessed. "J. A. A."

Spectator thinks that Jefferson Davis should be signally punished, but thinks hanging, in many respects, is too good for him. He says: "Mr. Davis must be condemned to death, but were I President Johnson, I would neither pardon him and send him into exile, nor allow him to be hanged. If he were pardoned on condition of exile, he would merely lead a comfortable, perhaps a luxurious life abroad, receiving much attention from certain people. He must be conspicuously punished, and yet not made a martyr either by his imprisonment or his death. Therefore, upon his condemnation I would reprieve his sentence indefinitely, on condition that he gave his parole never to leave the country, and to report himself once a month to the judicial or military officer of the republic nearest to his place of residence, and once a year to the President at Washington. From any position of public trust he is of course cut off. If necessary he should be comfortably supported at the expense of the nation. His only punishment should be that of owing his life to the clemency of the government he sought to destroy, and the becoming humiliation of publicly acknowledging its authority once a month while he lived. And such an example would be more instructive than a hanging. Thus would I do with the chief civil and military leaders of the rebellion."

A Panama paper gives the following as a "summary of news from Central and South America:"

"Chili at peace,
Bolivia quiet,
Peru in a row,
Ecuador in a riot,
Columbia sleeping,
Costa Rica the same,
Nicaragua keeping
The peace for a time.
Honduras uncertain
Which way to go,
Salvador's troubles ended,
Guatemala's also."

The most wretched snobbery of the day is practiced by those nests of antiquated conceit and medieval charlantry called "colleges." One of them has recently dubbed President Johnson L.L. D., and Union College has saddled Gen. Terry with a similar incumbrance. Tokens of popular respect become simply ridiculous when they take these idiotic forms. Gen. Terry might just as well have been dubbed M. D., or D.D., by some medical or theological establishment. Military services have their appropriate recognition in the rank which they secure. Brig.-Gen. Terry became Major-Gen. Terry for his good services at Fort Fisher. Such was the soldier's reward for a soldier's service. If he had distinguished himself in jurisprudence, it would have been meet and proper for Union College to have given him the honorarium of Doctor of Laws. There is a fitness in all things, and we hope Gen. Terry, for whose bravery and skill as a soldier, and worth and honesty as a man we have the greatest respect, will reprove the folly of the "learned corporation" of Union College by declining its probably well-meant, but very bungling attempt at a compliment.

Among the epitaphs in the churchyard in Newburyport, Mass., is one of a young lady who "was, in a state of health, suddenly summoned to ye skies, and snatched from ye eager embrace of her friends by swallowing a pea at her own table, when in a few hours she sweetly breathed her soul away." Another epitaph, in the same "God's acre," is as follows:

"Here lies in a state
Of perfect oblivion
J....A....
Death has decomposed him,
And at the general resurrection Christ
Will recompose him."

The Richmond Whig, remarking that "henceforth the impoverished youth of the south must look to labor for a livelihood, and the sooner the truth is realised the better," adds, "We are far from believing in the so-called nobility of labor, for if our memory serves us, labor is but the primal curse. In the days of our first innocency, we read of no such thing as eating one's bread in the sweat of one's brow, and it would take more than the tumid platitudes of rhetorical parsons to convince us that there is any dignity in toil." With such ideas and theories among the people, the injunction to practical labor will probably have little influence. Work is noble. When that truth becomes recognised by the youth of the south, impoverished or otherwise, then will its regeneration commence, and its career of prosperity open.

Punch says to marry two wives is bigamy; to marry 20 is Brigham-y. There appears to be here some allusion to the chief of the Mormons.

In the New York Herald, of July 22, we find this paragraph:

"Mr. B. S. Osbon, another naval correspondent, formerly commanded a vessel in the Buenos Ayres navy in 1850, being opposed to the forces of Urquiza. The usurper succeeding, Mr. Osbon was compelled to leave the country, a price being set upon his head, and came to this country, where he engaged on the Herald. Aware of the experience of Mr. Osbon in naval warfare Admirals Dupont, Farragut and Porter made him ever welcome on board their flagships. His adventures have been told in full in our correspondence. His letters from the Montauk, when lying before Fort McAllister, in the Ogeechee river, were republished in the official papers of Russia, Denmark, Sweden and Prussia. Mr. Osbon was in our service when Farragut ran the forts at New Orleans, and was the only correspondent who could be induced to run the risk of the batteries. He was specially honored by Admiral Farragut by being permitted to plant the first flag on the west bank of the river above New Orleans."

It is always a pleasure to bear witness to the enterprise of the New York Herald, which occupies the same position among the dailies that Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper does among the illustrated papers of the world; but we must respectfully say that Mr. Osbon was not "the only correspondent who could be induced to run the risk of the batteries at New Orleans," when the gallant Farragut captured the Crescent City, for Frank Leslie's artist, Mr. William Waud, was on board the Mississippi when she ran the gauntlet of Fort Jackson and Fort St. Philip, and that we are not quite sure but that our artist, who sketched that gallant achievement from the maintop of the Mississippi, did not suggest to our favourite admiral a similar act when he steamed past the iron-clads and frowning batteries of Mobile.

TOWN GOSSIP.

The great event of the week has been the Saengerfest, a gathering of all that is good and musical among our Teutonic fellow-citizens. There is always something honest about a musical man, and a nation of singers is ever a frank and fearless one. It is rather against the American race that it is not a singing one. No people more heartily join in a national and vain-glorious chorus—but who ever heard of an American "Free and Easy?" But we shall have a few words to say on this subject on a future occasion, and so return to our German friends, whose fine deep voices have for the past week made day and night melodious. To use part of one of their own songs,

"Und so finden wir uns wieder,
In den heitern bunten Reih'n,
Und es soll der Kranz der Lieder,
Frisch and gruen geflochten sein."

Our Artists have made some pleasant sketches of the recent festivities, which will be found in another part of our paper.

Barnum's fire and the Saengerfest have been "godsends," as Providential gifts are called, to the reporters, the latter, of course, being the most welcome—when ever to a gentleman connected with the press did a glass of lager or rhine wine come amiss? The jolly old abbot, whose famous song Leigh Hunt has so admirably translated, was a boon member of the fourth estate. Do our readers require further evidence than when he says,

I am one of those who never could write fasting,
By the smallest little boy I should be surpast in Writing so; I'd just as soon be buried, tombed, and grassed in.
But when I've had my lager beer, although I should not say so,
With half-a-dozen cups of wine, I beat Ovidius Naso.

And certainly, if ever Bacchus and Apollo ran in one team, it was at the Saengerfest, for never were more good-fellowship and music yoked together than on that occasion.

Some of the newspapers have attempted the comic—we give one effort, taken from a morning paper:

"Bowery boy—"I say, guv'nor, what rigimint is this 'ere?"

Dutchman—"Nein!"

Bowery boy—"Fellers, that's the Ninth regiment."

Dutchman—"No! no! Dess is de Minnesingers."

Bowery boy—"Certainly they're minnie singers, because they've been En-field."

Dutchman (greetly amused, after long interval)—"Yaw! yaw!"

Hose-boy—"I say! what society are you in?"

German—"De Leidertafel!"

Hose-boy—"Give us your fist. I'm a ladder devil, too; hook and ladder!"

Rowdy, to intelligent Teuton—"Hollo! old vat, what society are you in?"

German—"De fardest society from yours!"

Rowdy—"But I'm a orchester too! I'm a singer!"

German—"Yes, of de society of Sing Sing!"

The rather prolonged names of the several societies gave rise to some confusion of tongues, like the following:

German (mistaking a rough for a fellow musician)—"Velcome nibeiter gesangverein!"

Rough (astonished)—"Yes! ask a policeman!"

On Wednesday the Free Academy had their annual distribution of prizes at the Academy of Music, which was thronged with the sisters and sweethearts of the mental athletes—if the latter possess as much genius as their fair friends do beauty, our intellectual repute will equal that of our military. The aged chief of this college of democratic youth, Professor Webster, may be justly proud of his disciples. On another page will be found a medallion portrait of the Professor—the fidelity of which all will recognise.

The benefit for the employés of Barnum's Museum was not only a success but also a most gratifying affair. The great feature was an address by the irrepressible and popular Barnum, in which, while acknowledging the heavy loss he had sustained, he took up the song of the future, and foretold the glories of his unborn museum. In the meantime, he has engaged the Chinese Assembly rooms for the next year, as a point d'appui, to collect his curiosities, while his pantomime company will appear at the Winter Garden. To use the Turkish, we may add, "Great is Barnum, and the public is his profit!"

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—In the United States there are 53 religious sects. Amongst them are 10 different kinds of Baptists, 9 of Methodists, 13 of Presbyterians, and 2 of Quakers. The Baptists number 1,724,373 members or communicants, and the Methodists 1,651,732. The number professing the Roman Catholic religion is 3,177,140. The Baptists are divided into the following curious sects, viz., regular, antimission, seventhday, six-principle, freewill, riverbrethren, winebrennarians, dunkers, mennonites and campbellites. The Quakers are divided into orthodox and hicksite.

—— Great demand for negro labor exists in Maryland. The farmers there are paying $15 per month to males, and from $10 to $12 to females, for field labor. The supply is still short, and agents have again been sent in different directions to make contracts and induce emigration, notwithstanding their recent expulsion from Richmond.

—— The Elizabeth (N. J.) Journal says: "The box owned and used by Hogarth for keeping his brushes, paints and other materials, is now in the possession of Col. James V. Bomford, of this city. It was purchased at an auction sale of the effects of Hogarth, in London, soon after his death, by the grandfather of Col. Bomford, and has been in the possession of the family ever since. It is between two and three feet long, half as wide and about a foot deep."

—— The Richmond Republican, quoting the accounts of emigrants arriving in New York, says: "Send them South. We are hungering and thirsting after these stout, healthy emigrants. Our fields want them; our forests are sighing for them; finance wants them; the fireside wants them; politics wants them. We have broad acres and a welcome for many a day's importation of them—yes, many a month's cargo, even at this high rate, and we have a genial country, a hospitable people, easy employment, indulgent taskmasters, and abounding room for all."

—— The daughters of the F. F. V.'s., in Richmond, are now engaged in working on clothing, for the U. S. Government Bureau; 600 are thus employed at their own residences, earning about $5 per week. The clothing they make is intended for the colored troops in Texas.

—— The estimated receipts from the sales of government property, rendered of no further use by the termination of the war, horses, mules, wagons, &c., for the next two or three months, will amount to $100,000,000.

—— One of the representative regiments just returned from the war, after three years' service, is the 18th Connecticut. Two of its members are worth property to the amount of $200,000 each; both enlisted in the ranks, and are still privates, having refused commissions. Two other privates were formerly selectmen of their town in Connecticut.

—— The loss of Massachusetts officers during the war, has been as follows: general officers, 9; colonels, 16; lieutenant-colonels, 17; majors, 20; surgeons, 6; assistant-surgeons, 9; chaplains, 2; captains, 110; first lieutenants, 150; second lieutenants, 94.

—— The University of Virginia, founded by Jefferson, is soon to resume its duties with encouraging prospects.

—— Workmen are engaged in clearing away the debris of the fire on the site of the United States hotel at Saratoga, and plans for a new building will soon be perfected.

—— The population of Rochester, N. Y., is ascertained to be 51,260, an increase of 76 in five years, and of 7,383 in ten.

—— The city of Lowell, Mass., according to the new census, has a population of 30,757; a loss of 6,070 since 1860. With the exception of ward six, the principal loss is in the wards where those formerly employed in the cotton mills resided. Persons in the army and navy were counted in the families to which they belonged.

—— During the six weeks ending July 8, 210,339 government rations were issued to the destitute in Richmond, Va. The aggregate number of persons relieved was 60,118.

—— There is an establishment at Jonesboro', Maine, in which 5,000 lobsters are cooked daily, and 4,000 lbs. of the meat are daily put in air-tight cans of one and two pounds each. One hundred and thirty persons are engaged in catching the fish and sealing the cans.

—— Ex-Governor Magoffin, of Kentucky, perpetrated some queer logic, and indulged in some queer phraseology in a recent letter, advising the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment. He admits that, before the war, he thought slavery a divine institution. He is cured of that delusion. God, he argues, has brought about its destruction, and "I am not," he declares, "going to raise my puny arm against His decrees; especially," he adds, "as He is backed by the people of the whole civilized world, and by the people of our own country!"

—— Henry Sloat, of Vergennes, Vt., recently fined $20, and sentenced to jail for three months, for selling liquor, went alone to Middlebury jail last week, and demanded admittance according to the terms of sentence. They took him in.

—— The Metropolitan Police statistics show that over 10,000 lost children were found in the streets of New York, and taken in charge by the police during the past year. Of the entire number all were reclaimed by their parents, excepting 211, who were turned over to the Commissioners of Charities and Correction.

—— The consumption of beer is rapidly increasing in the United States. In 1860, the amount sold was 8,000,000 of barrels. In 1864, the quantity used had increased to 24,000,000 of barrels, or nearly a barrel apiece for everybody.

—— The annual exercises of the Free Academy took place on the 14th of July, at the Irving Hall, which was filled with a goodly collection of fashion and beauty. Among the speakers who acquitted themselves meritoriously, Hallock, Brinkerhoff and Carr, were prominent. The proceedings were enhanced by some excellent music from a fine band.

Foreign.—Italy now possesses a fleet of 93 vessels, 74 of which are ships of the line, and 24 are transports. The ships of war consist of 18 iron-clads, 21 screw steamers, 25 paddle-wheel steamers, and 10 sailing vessels. The nominal power of the engines in the war steamers is 23,140 horse; they reckon 1,260 cannon and 20,383 men. In the transport service the engines are 4,350 horse-power, and the ships are provided with 43 cannons and manned by 1,882 men.

—— The editors of the French papers have been directed by the Home Minister not to publish any Papal bulls or decrees without the previous sanction of the government.

—— Don Pedro Candamo, the richest capitalist in South America, has just died at Lima, leaving a fortune which, it is asserted, exceeds the sum of £16,000,000 sterling. He had been surnamed in that country the Prince of Bankers.

—— The authorities of St. Petersburg have just annulled the order which interdicted smoking in the streets.

—— The French Academy have awarded a medal worth 1,000 francs to the best candidate for the prize for poetry, as the prize itself is not to be awarded this year, the poems not being of sufficient merit. The subject of the poem, which was fixed by the Academy, was "Vercingetorix."

—— The rumor afloat, for some time past, that the Empress Eugenie, incited by the literary success of her husband, intended to write a history of Queen Marie Antoinette, has now been officially contradicted. It is probable that she had the intention, but received orders from headquarters that the subject chosen was too delicate. Perhaps she will now write the life of Cleopatra, of Sappho or Laïs. Nothing would be missing, then, in the literary family, but the Imperial Prince, who might, perhaps, decide to write the history of the she-wolf who nourished Romulus, and thus become, in some sense, the foster-mother of the Roman kings and Cæsars.

—— Emma, Queen of the Sandwich Islands, is now on a traveling tour, and it is probable that she may visit this country. Emma is only 25, intelligent and lady-like, and beautiful, according to the Sandwich Islands standard. Withal she is rich, owning considerable real estate, and having an annuity of $6,000, a handsome sum in Hawaii. Add that she is a widow, and the case becomes interesting.

—— A cruel parent at Quebec locked up his undutiful daughter, because she wanted to marry a young lawyer. The young man, however, though poor in purse, was fertile in resource, and sued out a writ of habeas corpus for his beloved. As she was of age to decide for herself, the couple were married and went on their way rejoicing.

—— The Congress of New Grenada has passed a decree declaring that President Juarez, of Mexico, has deserved well of America in view of the indomitable perseverance he has evinced in defence of the independence and freedom of his country, and that they regard his virtues and patriotism as affording an example to the Columbian youth. The decree also provides that the portrait of President Juarez be placed in the National Library of Bogota, with a suitable inscription.

—— Lord Brougham is very anxious to have the Cuban slave trade stopped. But he was not at all anxious to have the rebels fail in their attempt to establish an empire with slavery as the chief corner stone. This straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, is a trick that the noble lord should have outgrown before now.

—— A movement is on foot in Italy to canonize Christopher Columbus and make him the patron saint of mariners.

—— There are now in the English navy 26 iron-clads afloat, of which eight are not completed and six are building, together with five floating batteries.

—— The English House of Commons contains 252 officers of the army and navy, besides 75 who are connected with the services by marriage and other family relations. The officers are classed as follows: captains, 77; lieutenant-colonels, 65; majors, 26; colonels, 22; lieutenants, 22; cornets, 8; vice and rear-admirals, 4; lieutenant-generals, 3; generals, 2; with 23 paymasters, secretaries, etc. While the profession that fights has thus a force of 327 members, the vast interest of trade, commerce and manufactures has only 107, and the legal profession only 67.

—— Nineteen Japanese youths have arrived in England to be educated as physicians, engineers, etc. The ages of these youths appear to range from about 14 to 20. They are fine stalwart and intelligent fellows, and all dressed in English costume. Most of them can speak a little English. As soon as they landed at Southampton they paid a visit to the shops and streets in the town.

—— Prince Napoleon will soon proceed on a voyage of circumnavigation or discovery, which is likely to keep him away for a considerable period. He will be escorted by a body of savans.

—— The population of Cuba is 1,390,470, divided as follows:

	Males.		Females.		Total.
Whites......	432,624	..	364,986	..	757,210
Free colored.	109,027	..	116,816	..	225,843
Slaves.......	218,722	..	151,831	..	370 553
Asiatics......	34,771	..	57	..	34,828
Emancipados	4,719	..	1,871	..	6,590
Indians......	712	..	334	..	1,046

The most remarkable features in the census are the enormous excess of the male population over the female, and the decrease of white females. In fact, with the single exception of the free colored, there appears to be a general decay of the population; for the male increase in the white proper is not a natural one, but due to immigration from the mother country.

—— It seems that the Emperor of the French will not permit the Prince Imperial to confess in the ordinary way that other Roman Catholics find a comfort to their souls. There has been selected by his majesty an imperial road to purgatory, which consists of a number of questions being drawn up by his majesty, which are put by the father confessor of the prince, and in the presence and hearing of a third person. No other questions are allowed, and the church must be glad it gets as much as it does. There has been, naturally, a little warm discussion about the matter, but the issue has been the polite and politic obedience of the church, and the victory of the will of the Emperor.

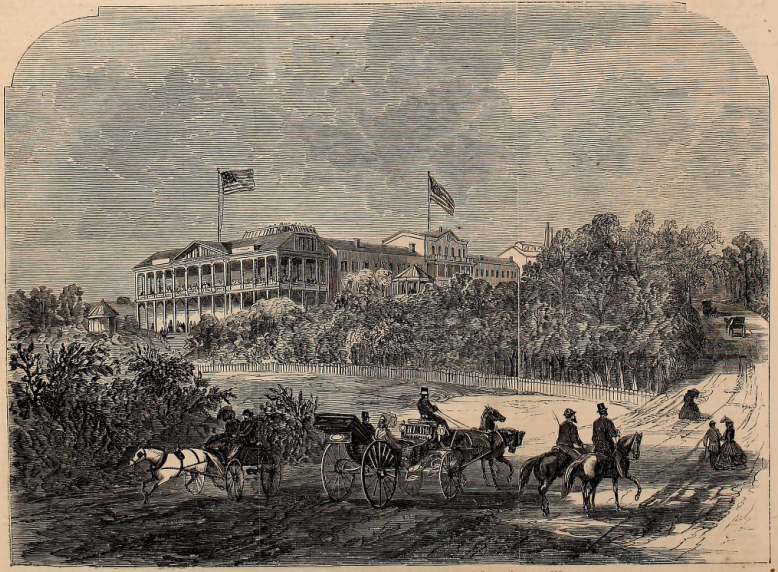
THE IDEAL WOMAN.

The ideal woman has often been described; we have known all about her from our boyhood. That she was a being born destitute of will, desire or aim of her own. That she lived and breathed, acted and suffered, in and for her husband and children—the former particularly. That she was "fragile" in form, with "tiny" hands, and "fairy" feet, and "silvery" voice. That she found her chief glory in making a shirt—her highest pleasure in compounding a pudding. That she watched her husband's looks, anticipating every wish without the smallest expectation of any attention or sacrifice from him in return. That she was utterly unable to frown or to say no. That she waited for her lord and master till all hours in the night, cheerfully sewing on his buttons, and never reproaching him for being late, or asking where he had been. That she "soothed his troubled brow," "consoled him by her sympathy," "cheered him by her smiles," "divided his cares and sorrows," and bore with entire satisfaction any amount of exclusion from his pleasures—accepting every crumb of his company with gratitude. In short, that she was born to be the humble contributor to man—to bear with his tempers, follow his fortunes, humor his whims, cater for his wants, watch over his illnesses, bring up his children, economize his means, promote his enjoyments—be wholly lost and swallowed up in him while he lived, and if she survived him, be content with a pittance of his estate, or a condition of dependence, if it proved to have been his sovereign will and pleasure to leave the fortune she had helped to accumulate, to posterity or the public.

All this has formed the staple material for the use of magazine writers and others, when they would show up the ideal woman, and the world has hailed the picture with complacence. It was nice to think that so convenient a class had been created for the good of the higher; and if the gentlemen were pleased, why the ladies must be, of course, or they could not claim to be ideal women. And we have no special objection to make, if only the thing be rightly understood. The nice, pussy-like woman we have sketched may be agreeably translated by a master hand into sundry heroines, and her lot is not always an unlovely one. The happiness of making sacrifices is, under certain conditions, the sweetest and highest of all; and as soon as the ideal man shall be embodied, there can be no word of objection to this mould for the ideal woman. As things are now, indeed, her lot would not be enviable, unless she were born a sort of mental and moral jelly, and a very mild jelly, too. There must be no wine in it, or the spirit would hardly be as amenable as the case requires. Few of our lady friends, we may venture to observe, would be prominent in desiring to become ideals on these terms; still fewer, perhaps, would furnish the requisite material.

A correspondent says: "If you wish to do the fresh-air-loving people a service, who can't go far from New York, a service, tell them that they can find an excellent hotel at New Brighton, Staten Island. It is called Peteler's Hotel, and is most beautifully situated on a hill overlooking the entire bay of New York, Greenwood, Brooklyn, Hoboken, Bergen, etc. The table is really excellent, the rooms are large and airy, while the charges are moderate. To crown the whole, the host is courteous, and the attendants attentive."

Hindoo Fanatics.—I have seen some who had stood on one leg for years, while others engage the sympathy and extort the charity of many by holding one arm erect overhead, until in time the flesh withers and the bones set in that position. A few I have met, who, firmly clenching one hand, have kept it closed until the nails have grown right through the palm to the other side; and it is well-known that many have traveled the whole extent of the land from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin, measuring their bodies as they went. Also, there is Charak Puja, or hook worship, in which the devotee allows a steel hook to be passed through the muscles of his back, and in this manner is suspended from a machine like a windmill, to one of the arms of which the victim is attached. On their great feast days they can be seen thus, whirling round and round, and looking all the time as pleased as if they really enjoyed their ride. All this is done with a devotion worthy of a better cause.



Changes in Delhi.—Seven years have passed away, and Delhi still stands, but changed—changed for the better in its moral, social and political aspects. The Delhi of 1865 is not the Delhi of 1857. When we beheld the change that has come over the old city, we, while we dropped a tear to the sad memory of our slaughtered friends, are ready to exclaim, "Thank God we had this mutiny, since it has irrevocably destroyed the Mohammedan power in India, and raised that of Great Britain!" From a native city, sunk in unfathomable vice, it has now become an English station, with fine broad streets and numerous English houses; and when the railway will be completed, and all the proposed alterations and other public structures finished, Delhi will become one of the finest cities under the Punjaub government. The future traveler, as he passes through, will find it difficult to recognise the old Mogul capital. The Jumah Musjid resounds no more with the shrieking summons of the of the muezzin and the loud prayers of the faithful, as it did in days gone by. The lofty rooms, the arched corridors, are stamped with the image of death; gone are the worshipers, silent are the voices of the priests; and the Feringhee, who dared not once at a time to enter the threshold of the great mosque, enters now carelessly and without fear. The marble halls, too, still exist, but gone are all their inner splendors; the throne is wanting, and the titular Emperor, the last of the Moguls, who used in his dotage to sit upon it, died the other day in exile. What was once the palace of an emperor is now a barrack, and where once English ambassadors came to ask for land or for permission to trade, English soldiers now live, and make the domed roof echo to their songs and jests. To one pacing up and down this spacious hall of judgment, and reviewing things present and past, it seems a dream that such changes should ever have taken place.

PAUL FALK'S LION PARK, AT THE CORNER OF 8TH AVENUE AND 110TH STREET, NEW YORK, ONE OF THE GREAT SUMMER RESORTS OF NEW YORK CITY—VIEW OF THE HOTEL.

PAUL FALK'S LION PARK.

Of the many popular resorts the tired denizen of New York city delights to visit, Paul Falk's Lion Park may be considered the most popular of them all—crème de la crème. The enterprising proprietor has for many years foreseen the necessity of providing the public with some general place of resort, where amusement combined with healthful drives and walks could be found. In his purchase of Lion Park and the extensive improvements he has made on the grounds, he has accomplished his cherished object, and has fully satisfied the wish of the public. The park is situated on Eighth avenue, corner of 110th street, and contains some 16 acres of ground, tastefully decorated with pleasure walks and avenues, arbors and nooks, and pleasant greeneries—something after the manner of the "Cremorne Gardens," in London, and the Chateau de Fleurs, in Paris. For those who wish to be entirely secluded there are private dining rooms and ice-creameries; and those who desire to view the charms of nature a fine observatory affords an opportunity. From this point the vision ranges over wooded fields, slumbering hamlets, and the broad-bosomed, sail-embosomed Hudson. This view alone is worth a visit to the park. Free concerts take place every Wednesday and Saturday, Thomas' Band of 16 pieces having been engaged for the season. In addition to the multifarious charms at present afforded to the public, very extensive improvements are being pushed rapidly forward, demonstrating that the enterprising proprietor has set his mind upon creating a place that shall attract the patronage of the most fastidious patrons of public caterers.

"HOME FROM THE WAR."

BY GEORGE COOPER.

Annie's by the garden gate,
Looking down the lane,
While the amber clouds of sunset
Pour their golden rain.

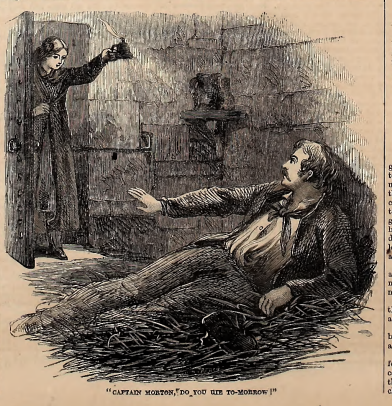
Tells the village bell "good-night"—
Hushed the fragrant bowers,
And the birds will soon be dreaming
Of the blooming flowers.

Annie's eyes with love are glowing,
Some one now she sees,
As she clicks the gate behind her,
Near the wayside trees.

Two are straying in the twilight;
Three long years ago,
Some one very dear to Annie,
Went away, you know.

Went away to fight for freedom;
Has he come again?
There's a soldier-boy with Annie
Coming up the lane.

And her cheeks are sweetly blushing,
As he whispers low;
What he's telling in the shadows
Would you like to know?



THE ESCAPED SPY;

A Story of the Late War.

BY E. G. R.

It was a beautiful star-light night. The silvery waters of the James river slumbered as calmly as an infant, with the wooded shores and tall fortifications around, reflecting darkly in the placid surface. Scarcely a breath disturbed the quiet midsummer air. Occasionally a ripple would break on the shore with a low, measured harmony, and anon a tiny wave would glisten in the starlight, as a slight breeze ruffled the surface of the sleeping waters.

The tread of busy feet was hushed; the noise of the day had ceased; the cry of the sentinel had died away among the far-off hills, and the silence of midnight, deep, hushed and awe-inspiring, hung over Richmond.

"CAPTAIN MORTON,' DO YOU HIS TO-MORROW!"

In a remote portion of the city, stood a large, old, rambling row of buildings, dark, mossy, frowning and partly in ruins. Within this range of buildings, in a dark and noisome cell, reclined, upon a scanty bed of straw, a Federal soldier. His face was pale and attenuated, but it had lost, amid all his sufferings, none of the noble expressions of high resolve. For many weary days he had lain in that loathsome dungeon, and the morrow's sunrise was to see him die upon the gallows as a spy.

"Yes," he muttered to himself, "the agony will soon be over; it is but a few moments at most, and shall an American soldier fear death? No; come when it may—as it may—it will be welcome; and how much more welcome when it is suffered as the penalty of having served my country. But yet it is a fearful trial. I could fall in battle, for there a thousand eyes would behold my devotion to my country; but to die alone, unheard-of—with only a bitter, unrelenting foe around me—oh, it is indeed an agonizing thought. Yet, I fear not even this. Thank God!" he fervently ejaculated, "there is strength given us in the darkest hour of trial, which bears us up against every suffering."

The speaker suddenly started, ceased, and looked around. The bolt of his door was being withdrawn from the outside. Could it be that his guard was about to enter, and bid him prepare to face death? Slowly the massive door swung upon its hinges, a burst of light streaming into the cell, for a moment dazzled the eyes of the captive; but when he grew gradually accustomed to the glare, he started, with surprise, even greater, to behold, not, as he supposed, a guard, but a young and lovely girl, wrapped in a long dark cloak. For an instant the young soldier looked amazed, as if he beheld a being from another world.

"HOW SHALL I EVER REPAY YOU FOR ALL YOU HAVE RISKED TO SAVE ME."

"Captain Morton!" said the fair apparition, in a low, sweet voice, which, melting from her lips, made a very word seem musical, "do you die to-morrow?"

"To such a fate have I been condemned," said the soldier, firmly, "but what mean you—why are you here?"

"To save you!" replied the lovely girl, fixing her dark, lustrous eyes upon him, "that is, if you are willing to save yourself."

The young soldier, who had eagerly started forward at the first part of her sentence, now recoiled, and with a firm voice, though one gentler than he would have used to one less fair, exclaimed:

"And have you been sent to tempt me to betray my country? Go to those from whom you came, and tell them that Charlton Morton will meet death rejoicing, sooner than purchase life by an act of dishonor —"

"You wrong me—you indeed wrong me," hastily interrupted the lady. "I come not to ask you to desert your country, but to offer you freedom to return to it. Listen—for my story must be brief—my only brother was a confederate soldier; he entered Kentucky with Gen. M——, was engaged in several battles, in one of which he was severely wounded, and left upon the field among the dead. Duty calling my weary brain it hung upon a thread. At length, when consciousness returned, he found himself, not in a gloomy prison, surrounded by hostile nurses, but in the elegant home of a kind and benevolent lady, who had nursed and cared for him with all the tenderness of a mother's love. When completely restored to strength and health, the good lady told him how she had found him lying almost lifeless, and how, in a frantic fury, she had taken him to her own house—concealing his presence from all—and nursed him through so long and weary an illness.

Then she spoke of her own brave boy—an officer in the Federal army—and said it was for his sake—if was the thought that he might be suffering far from home, languishing for a mother's love—that had touched her noble heart, and caused her to deal so kindly with the poor wounded boy. When the time arrived for him to take his departure, he took a sorrowful adieu to his kind preserver, saying:

"Dear lady, circumstances may throw your son in my path, and should ever he in danger, remember, dear, I swear that I will save him, even at the cost of my own life."

How truly he kept his vow, my broken heart today witnesses—for that lady "was your mother, Captain Morton; and the young officer who lost his life at the head of one of yellow-skinned troops upon the day of your capture, when endeavoring to take you prisoner, in order to convey you to a place of safety, and saved you to cause you your own noble brother. Now you know why I would free you. Come, then, exchange your clothes with my maid, who is outside, and follow me. No questions will be asked; the guard know me, and will not suspect anything wrong."

"It is enough, fair lady, my more than deliverer," said the grateful captive, "gladly will I accept life to devote to the service of my country, and repay you ——"

"Hush!" said the girl, in a whisper, placing her finger on her lips, "prepare and follow me;" and turning around, she passed swiftly through the open door, and extinguished her light, locked around to see if she was followed, then, softly, beneath a dark street overhung with thick trees.

Who can describe the emotions of Captain Morton, as he traversed the street after his guide? His release had been so sudden, that it seemed like a dream; he placed his hand upon his brow, as if to assure himself of the reality of the passing scene. Nor were the sensations which he experienced less varied than tumultuous; for over every other feeling one was predominant—the determination to perish rather than be recaptured.

Their noiseless, but rapid flight past the guard, who spoke not a word to the lady and her maid, and through the streets, was soon safely completed; and it was only when arriving outside of the city, at a group of outstanding trees, beneath which stood two horses and a negro men, as if awaiting them, that the young girl broke the silence:

"Mount, Captain Morton," she said in her sweet voice, now trembling with emotion; and then turning towards the home of her childhood, she protested all that was earthly of her beloved brother, she gazed mournfully a moment, and Captain Morton saw by the glimmering light of approaching day, that she wept.

Ole Cato done feared pretty Miss Nellie not comin," said the faithful old negro, as he assisted Captain Morton to mount.

We were delayed until the guard changed, Uncle Cato; then we are safe now. Return to the city, and tell no one of what has occurred to-night. Captain Morton, I myself, will guide you, and you reach a place of safety; every portion of the surrounding country is familiar to me."

In a few moments they were commanded, and so complete had been the maiden's preparations, that she led only to throw aside her cloak, underneath which she was attired in full Confederate uniform. This would enable her to pass through the country, and none would suspect the sister of the gallant Colonel Rudolph, of aiding the escape of one.

They galloped long and swiftly through what remained of the night, and just as morning began to break across the distant hills, they turned down into a thick forest, and dismounted to rest. Captain Morton tied the foaming steeds a short distance apart, and returning, seated himself upon a moss-covered rock at the side of his fair guide.

"Miss Randolph," said the young officer, "how shall I ever repay you for all you have risked to save me."

"You owe me nothing, Captain Morton. I am but repaying your noble mother the great debt I owe her. Had it not been for her kind care, Edwin Randolph would have died on a foreign land, and would have been laid in an unknown grave. Poor boy! he died bravely, endeavoring to save your life; and he rests now by the side of his fathers, where my tears can water the green sod that covers his noble heart," said the maiden, drooping her eyes, and speaking with a tremulousness of tone that told more plainly than words the depth of her sorrow.

It was late in the afternoon when they again set forth on their flight. Captain Morton, when the road permitted, was ever at the side of the fair Helen, and although his keen eye often swept anxiously around the landscape, their conversation soon grew deeply interesting.

"If they have discovered my escape, pursuit must have long since ceased," said the captain.

"They have, of course, discovered your flight, but pursued in a different route, as I was sure they would; ponder is the last hill hiding us from the Federal camp. When we gain that, we shall be able to see, through still distant, the tents of Gen. H——'s men. You see, Captain Morton, that I have traveled a road entirely unused, and have more regarding your troops than you would suppose," said Helen, smiling.

The eyes of the captain sparkled with pleasure, and giving the reins to his steed, they soon reached the summit. The moment they gained it them was so grand and imposing that, involuntarily, for a moment they drew in their horses and gazed.

Before them stretched out a broad expansive country, bounded on one side by chains of hills, while on the other glistened in array the waters of the Potomac dancing in the morning sun like a sea of molten silver. Rich emerald fields of waving grass—sparkling streams, now lost and now emerging from the flowing water—rolling uplands, crowned with forests—and, distant but seen in the distance, a long line of snow-white tents, telling where lay the Federal camps, opened out before the eyes of the fugitive soldier.

The fair girl turned to behold the beautiful landscape, gazed spell-bound in silence, and then she looked upon the features of another of her sunny home, heaved a deep sigh, and calmly said:

"I will leave you here, Captain Morton, as you can proceed without a guide; tell your kind mother—"

"No!" cried Miss Randolph, interrupting the soldier, with a sudden start, "see you troop of Confederate horsemen coming up the hill-side in our rear—here is a line with their banners."

"I see them, they are a portion of Gen. L——'s command; knowing them to be near I should not have paused here. But, Miss Randolph, mount and are in pursuit."

"Or—or," was the only reply of the captain, as he sprang into the saddle, the maiden rode, and plunged his spurs deep into the horse's flanks.

They had not been in motion long before they beheld their pursuers approaching rapidly, sweeping over the brow of the hill above in a close column.

"Swifter—swifter, Miss Randolph; I would not have them capture me, as you would be recognized," said the captain, looking back.

"Oh, we are lost," suddenly exclaimed Helen; "see they are winding up the hill."

At Soldier's very bidding, at the guidance of her finger, beheld a half-mile beneath him a body of Confederates, closing up the egress of the fugitives, but at present was to be escaped.

Where does the horse path lead, Miss Randolph?" he asked, turning his gaze, and speaking to a narrow way, winding among the trees, towards the left."

"It is not the great road, some miles below, enter it, and we may escape ere they can surround us."

Their pace was now more rapid, until they reached a narrow gorge, overhung by high and inaccessible rocks, and opening behind into a wide highway, bordering upon a plain below.

"How far do you think it is to the Federal lines from here?" asked Morton.

"Three miles I fear, captain, is the nearest point, but we will soon reach it. I must now, however, leave you to be captured, and return inside the Federal lines, and await my opportunity to return to Richmond; for the present I will go to New York, where I have an uncle residing."

On they traveled over the wide country, seeking the most secluded path, avoiding the open road, until, as the day were on, and the golden sun set of crimson and gold revealed to them the white tents and blue uniforms of the Federal soldiers.

It was the moment they feared the picket, and all danger to the fugitives was past.

In the elegant drawing-room of one of the wealthiest merchants of New York, a few months after the events Charlton Morton awaiting the the entrance of Miss Randolph. Since the period of his escape he had been engaged in active service, and, having left the Federal army, and resigned in the north, he had obtained leave of absence, and, his fair preserver, ere she departed for the south.

He had thought long and ardently of the brave girl. He knew that she was now in a camp-fire in the whirl of battle—surrounded by the beautiful and gay—wherever, in short, he went, the young lady was married with the world, and that the noble, self-sacrificing young girl, who, at the peril of her life, had saved him from death. Oh! how he dreaded, if ever he met her again, to find that he might see the beautiful Helen once more.

As he was swayed thus by his emotions he heard a light step, and, looking, beheld Helen Randolph enter the room.

"Miss Randolph," he ejaculated.

"Captain Morton!" said Helen, eagerly advancing; but shocking herself as instantly, she stood in beautiful embarrassment.

Both felt the difficulty of their position, and both would have spoken, but could not. At length Helen said:

"Captain, I am pleased that you have come to me, before I leave this land forever."

"Leave New York—she no—forever!" ejaculated the officer.

"Yes, Captain Morton, I am going to return to my own sunny land far away; but I cannot depart from the north without feelings of deep regret, and as earnest wish that all the people of the south could see those they deem such bitter enemies, as I have seen them; it would do more to bring the war to a speedy termination than years of contest."

A bright but forbidden hope lighted up the countenance of the young soldier, and perceiving the embarrassment with which the beautiful girl paused, he said:

"Dear Helen, I cannot hear you speak of taking leave of us for ever, without telling you how deeply I love you. Oh, if not presumptuous, might I hope ts prevail upon you to stay with us forever?"

The trembling girl blushed, but did not withdraw her hand, which the young man fondly clasped in his. He raised it to his lips, kissing it fervently. The next moment the weeping girl lay sobbing upon his bosom. She, too, had learned to love the young officer with all the ardor of her warm southern nature.

At length she raised her head, and smoothing back the tangled masses of raven hair from her tear-stained face, said:

"What will they say of me in my distant home, when they hear that a Randolph has learned to love a member of the south?" Then, sighing deeply, continued: "And who will care for poor Edwin's grave, planting there, and watering the bright flowers there in? My saddest thought will be that I may never visit it again."

"Grieve yourself not, darling, with such thoughts. The time is not far distant when our suffering country will be one. The bright sun of peace will again shine on the earth, will, ere each rear rolls round, shed its refulgent rays upon our country united—stronger and better, for the violent storm through which it has passed. As for poor Edwin's grave, we will visit it yearly, and garland it with fresh floral offerings, for Virginia, the land of his adoption, is, as our common country. Think not of our dear land as divided, as a true patriot should, but as one land, south east or west our country, one flag, one shield, one symbol to the watchword of every American!"

OUR MARTYRS.

BY J. B. ROBERTS.

O, LIFE seems dearer, and death sweeter, it has passed,
The dread ordeal of the battle hour;
And our fair land is blest with peace at last—
Its flag is redeemed, and its rights secure.

A nation's formed of such a chain of men?
Who, as a class, can govern all alone,
Let pass the trial of the mid-battle,
To rise up stronger, and with fresher life?

God has indeed outstretched His mighty hand
To aid the purpose of the good and just,
And spread His benedict over our cherished land,
That traitor hands our laws might not destroy,
O, may we ever, as a nation be Approved of heaven, and for ever free!

Our hearts o'erflow with gratitude and joy,
As memory's tale of martyrs who have died,
And rend o'er us in despotic pride.
Now we remember them as one ne'er recall;
But we, the living, deify them all.

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE IRETON ST. JOHN.

AUTHOR OF "THE LASS OF RICHMOND HILL," "THE WORLD'S VERDICT," ETC.

CHAPTER XX.—THE IRON CASKET.

NIGHT was beginning to fall over Thornton Heath, and from the hill above Raymond Park the misty darkness was beginning to roll down over the scene.

Mrs. Freshfield had been standing at the door of her cottage for more than an hour, anxiously glancing up the road to London; and as she gazed around her, she could see the tall trees and the old gables of Raymond park disappearing in the shadowy darkness.

The trees and common had now merged into a sombre, and almost undistinguishable mass, and she seemed to be standing alone, without a sign of anything of life around her.

Her little cottage, at all times dreary, was ten times more lonely and miserable still, now that she was left without any one to whom she could pour forth her thoughts, or could sympathize with her sorrow. The knowledge that the girl whom she had loved and cared for as her own child, was the child of another, was heartrending and terrible enough, but it was rendered more heartrending and more terrible now that her own child was lost to her.

It was with a weary heart that she at length turned from the door and entered the cottage, where she sat down by the fire in a kind of hopeless way, with her hands clasped over her knees, and her eyes apparently gleaming into the fire, though, in reality, she was gazing into vacancy.

Presently, however, she was roused by a knock at the door, and in another moment George Freshfield entered.

It was he whom she had been expecting, though what hope of help there lay in his coming, it would be difficult to say.

He entered with his usual swaggering gait, and seating himself near her, looked her for some moments steadily in the face.

"You know what I have come for?" he said, at length, eagerly and abruptly.

"I do not."

"You don't, eh? Well, I'll soon explain, then, I come for the child!"

"You are too late," she answered; "she is gone."

The man laughed loudly.

"She is, is she? Why, it is not a she at all. That's one of your mistake all along. It is a boy—not a girl!"

Mrs. Freshfield gazed at him in amazement. What could he mean? What did Guy Raymond mean by thus deceiving her?

"You are talking to me in riddles," she said; "pray, explain yourself."

He did so; briefly telling her the story of Claudia as Guy Raymond had told it to him, and not in any way sparing her feelings; not because he had any design in burrowing her heart, but because he was thinking only of the wishes of her sorrow.

"And now," he said, as he finished his story, "and now understand me. My brother has left me guardian of the child—or man, he must be—and I must have him in my charge. Where is he?"

Mrs. Freshfield's tears were flowing freely, and she could hardly sob out her answer.

"Where is he? Why do you ask me? Am I not seeking for my child; and do you come to me for him?"

"Woman, who had before reason to believe that she knew nothing of the whereabouts of the child, saw plainly from her manner that she was not endeavoring to practice any deceit upon him.

"Then," said he, "if you know nothing, I must endeavor to enlighten you."

"Do so," she said.

"You have an iron box or casket in your possession, which you have often tried to open, and as often failed?"

She started in amazement.

"Who told you?" What know you about it?"

"That matters not," he replied. "Have you the casket, or have you not?"

"I have."

"Then give it me, and I will tell you news of your child."

For a moment she hesitated; but then the yearning love of a mother towards her offspring, overcame every feeling of doubt, and she rose to fetch it.

"I will bring it you," she said.

As she left the room, George Freshfield grinned a smile of exultant triumph at the thoughts of gaining possession of the document's he so much coveted. When those were in his keeping, he would very soon be able to finger the money, which, after all, was his grand object.

Mrs. Freshfield, in the mean time, had entered a bedroom, and, rising in her hand a little round box of iron, fastened by a brass lock.

"Perhaps," she said, addressing her visitor, "I promise me that you will not deceive me, and that you will do all you are able to restore my child to me."

"I promise!" he answered, as she placed the box in his hands.

A small key was produced in a moment, which he inserted in the lock.

But rusty from many years' disuse, the fastening for some time defied his efforts. At length, with a loud snap, the spring shot back, and the box was open.

Within was a packet of papers methodically arranged, and tied with red tape.

George Freshfield's hand trembled as he clutched his prize, not from any qualms of conscience at the thought of robbing the widow and orphan, but with the excitement of joy and curiosity at the success of the errand on which he had visited his caterin-law.

One by one he opened them, and glanced at their contents.

"Here, I see here!" he cried. "You thought your child was a girl, did you? Read this!"

As he spoke, he held a slip of paper before her eyes.

It was a copy of the certificate of the baptism at Charles Henry, son of Richard Freshfield, and Sarah, his wife.

"Give it me—give me my son!" cried she, clutching the collar of his coat.

"Gently, gently," he said, holding the paper above his head out of her reach. "I require it in order to find your son."

"Then," she cried, raised the poor woman, pointing to the other papers in the open box.

George Freshfield took these others, and thrust them into his pocket. Then again, locking the casket, he restored it to her, bidding her take care of it.

"I will!" she cried; "but restore me my child!"

George Freshfield took her hand in his own, and with an affectation of honest sincerity, though deceit and fraud were in his heart, answered her. "I will find him here," he said; "and, in a day, I will bring him here to you; for is he not your son, and my nephew?"

So saying, he passed out into the open air, and the lonely widow soon lost sight of him in the darkening night, which every moment grew more thickly gathering over the face of the earth.

Turning round after a while, he saw his sister-in-law standing at the open door of the cottage, looking after him, candle in hand.

"You shall have your son," he cried, "if you can get him; but I will have the money for my trouble first."

Then with a malignant scowl on his brow, George Freshfield passed away, his form being soon lost sight of in the deepening shadows which enveloped the face of nature.

And now, by virtue of that magic power possessed alone by the pen, we change the scene to the little cul-de-sac at the back of the Nile inn, "The Hollow Oak."

The same darkness which hid George Freshfield from the straining eyeballs of his sister-in-law, gathered in and closed around the little building at the back of the inn in which Ella Raymond was a prisoner; casting a mantle over all surrounding objects, till at length she could only distinguish the house itself by the few lights which glim mered here and there in its diamond-paned windows.

"Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and Ella, as she thought of the promises of hope which had been held out to her by the daughter of the landlady, felt the sickening languor of despair at her heart's core.

She was still a prisoner—why, she knew not. There was only one man who would dare deprive her of her liberty—and as yet she had no positive proof that he was her gaolor.

The threats which he had held out floated in a mist of dim recollections through her mind; but she little thought that Arthur Arbuthnot would thus brave the anger and resentment of her husband.

Presently a light flashed across the window, a key was heard turning, and Sir Arthur Arbuthnot stood before her.

"So ho!" he cried, glancing at her pale face and eager eyes; "my pretty bird pines in its captivity, and beats its wings against the bars of its prison!"

"If your orders have caused me thus to be detained, pray release me at once!"

He sat down, cross-legged, on a chair, and lit a cigar, ere he replied:

"You shall have your liberty on one condition."

"Name it!"

"That you fly with me to France!"

"Never, infamous villain! Rather would I remain here in captivity a lifetime, than so degrade myself!"

He laughed loudly.

"Scold away—I am well used to it! Your hard words will do you no good, though!"

"Heaven will protect and save me!"

"I don't think so!"

"Blasphemous wretch! are you not afraid of calling down vengeance on your head?"

"No—I am only afraid of disturbing your temper, my pretty one;" and he glanced at her with a look of sensual admiration.

Ella made no reply.

"Silence will avail you little!" he continued. "Whether you remain dumb, or scold me till your tongue aches, you shall still be mine!"

"Never, monster!"

"But I say yes! I have sworn it!"

"My husband——"

"Knows not where you are!"

Ella's countenance fell, and she seemed like one bereft of all hope. Indeed her only chance now was the fulfillment of the promises made by Jane Cassel.

Her ruffianly visitor now rose to take his departure.

"Think over what I have said, pretty one!" he said; "and don't take too much time about your reflections. I shall call for your answer to-morrow night; and then, whether you like it or not, you shall go with me! It will only be a question whether you accompany me willingly or on compulsion!"

With these parting words of consolation he left the apartment; and Ella heard the door firmly secured.

And then she threw herself on the bed, and burst into a flood of tears.

She wept at the thought of the brutal insults and violence to which she was subjected, the hopelessness of her position, and the apparent faithlessness of the girl in whom she had placed confidence.

At length wearied nature asserted its sway, and sleep stilled her restless limbs and throbbing brow.

For some hours she lay thus, dreaming of far different scenes—of her childhood's happy days—of the brief happiness of her married life; and then she seemed to see Walter's well-known form beckoning her on to follow him.

With a start she awoke, and found herself in total darkness. All seemed quiet, too, in the inn.

Slowly she rose from her couch, as though the dream were continued in her waking moments, and walked towards the door.

To her astonishment, it yielded to her touch, and in a moment she stood beneath the blue starlit vault of heaven.

The whole place seemed deserted; she walked through the inn—there was no sign of any living soul.

Another minute, and she was hurrying along the highway in the direction of Thornton Heath.

CHAPTER XXI.—A NIGHT ADVENTURE.

RALPH ST. CLARE, approaching Thornton with weary and fast failing steps, stopped for a while to rest himself upon the stone ledge of some railings fronting a cottage, which stood some distance back from the road.

For a time he sat with his hands passed over his aching brow, longing for strength to continue his journey.

But after a few moments his attention was attracted by a low murmuring sound, which after a while took the form of an exquisite air, which was an old favorite of his, and recalled times of happier existence.

For a while he listened; then, as the voice, too, seemed familiar to him, he turned towards the spot whence the sound appeared to proceed.

A girl was standing in the centre of the garden, bending over a bed of flowers, singing as she tended them.

Her face was averted, but there was something in that glorious form which was well-known to Ralph, and obeying the instinct of love, he opened the garden gate and entered, uninvited.

The girl, surprised by the sound of footsteps, started round, and revealed to Ralph that he had made no error.

It was indeed Claudia, who, now advancing towards him, greeted him with a sweet smile.

"Dear Ralph," she said, "how happy I am to see you!"

The voice was the same as of old, yet, oh, how different; and the expression of her face, too, how changed.

It was the same face, those were the same eyes, that was the same white forehead, and the same, too, that ruby mouth, over which her sweet smile played lovingly.

Yet the light of reason was there now—the clear light of reason, which had so long deserted it, now mingled with the rich glow of health.

To ask her how this had happened would have been a cruelty, but it needed no asking—she read the question in his eyes.

"You wonder to see me thus, Ralph," she said, sweetly yet sadly. "It is a short story. My father brought me here."

"Your father?"

"Yes, your uncle, Guy Raymond; he is my father."

Ralph St. Clare gazed at her a moment, as if he thought her old malady was returning; but laughing lightly, she took his hand in hers, saying:

"Yes, yes, dear Ralph, we are indeed cousins. Listen, while I tell you my story."

The story was soon told, and the story of her return to reason was simple.

She had been brought to the cottage by Guy Raymond, she had been treated with kindness, she had been placed under the care of eminent physicians, and freedom, fresh air and skill, had wrought upon her an effectual cure.

It had cured her of all but one thing—it had not cured her of her love for Ralph.

They had entered the house together, and had sat down lovingly in the front drawing-room, when Guy Raymond entered suddenly.

He cast a look of fury upon Ralph, as he cried:

"What means this intrusion? Have I not forbidden this, Claudia?"

Ralph St. Clare rose, and with his hand raised deprecatingly, said, in a tone of deep respect:

"Sir, I am here because I have a right to be."

"A right! Who gives you a right to be in my house?"

"You yourself will give me the right, uncle, if you will but for a moment listen to me. You are alienated from me because you believe me guilty of robbery—because you believe me the man who committed a cowardly outrage upon you. Is it not so?"

"It is."

"I can prove my innocence now—Providence has placed the means in my hand almost by a miracle. Gideon Crawleigh was your informant?"

"Yes."

"He himself was the thief; he was himself the man who attacked you on the night when you were making the will in favor of Claudia; and now, if you will allow me, I will explain to you the strange method in which I made this discovery."

"Certainly," returned Guy Raymond, seating himself near them. "I cannot, in common justice, refuse to listen. Proceed."

"I entered Thornton this afternoon," proceeded Ralph St. Clare, "and stopped to rest at the Lion and Unicorn. I was sitting on a bench near the door of the tap-room, when I heard the voices of my cousin Walter and Gideon Crawleigh."

"I listened eagerly, for I had long suspected their complicity in robbing you. Of my cousin I am compelled to speak—compelled to reveal to you his criminality. If it were for my own sake alone I would not do so; but it is for Claudia's sake I do it—for the sake of the love I bear her, and the hope I have that you will yield to it at last.

"My cousin Walter was speaking when I first distinguished their words.

"'I don't like it,' he said; 'I don't like it. I'm sure that we shall be found out at last, and then my utter ruin will be imminent.'

"'You are chicken-hearted,' cried Gideon. 'Have I not risked more than you, and did I not fire upon the old man when he was making out the will in favor of Claudia? And do you fear to go once more into his den? But one thing is certain—you must this once, for I am ruined, and if I fall, you fall too.'

"'You are so extravagant,' said Walter, 'that if you were in possession of all the wealth of the Indies, you would spend it in a year.'

"Gideon laughed.

"'Well, I have been extravagant. I have spent a good deal of money in my time, but this is the last haul I want, and it must be a good one.'

"After a moment's hesitation Walter assented.

"'Well,' he said, 'this time I yield to you. At eight I will meet you at the gibbet, on the heath.'

"Then he rose as if in anger, and quitted the room, brushing close by me, so that I feared recognition. Soon after him came Gideon Crawleigh, smiling, and triumphant, and immediately after their departure I came on here."

For a few moments Guy Raymond did not speak.

At length he said "Ralph, your story bears the impress of truth, and it is my wish to believe you. If things turn out as you say, I will do so. Meanwhile, I may tell you that I have discovered your innocence of the crime for which you fled, and if this other crime is fixed upon others, I am willing that Claudia shall be yours. Nay, no ecstacies now; wait till all is settled."

At eight o'clock that night Walter Raymond and Gideon Crawleigh met, as appointed, beneath the gibbet on the heath.

Ella had returned home on the evening before terribly shocked and alarmed, but unhurt.

During her absence, Walter—racing about like a madman, but unable to find any clue to her whereabouts, or the person who had taken her away from him—had leisure for reflection, and reflection gave rise to terrible doubts and suspicions.

Could she have fled from him willingly? Could he have driven her from him by his own misconduct?—for he certainly had neglected her—certainly had conduced to make her unhappy—certainly had given her cause to complain. Yet she had not complained, and this gave him a certain degree of hope, for surely she would not desert him thus, without saying a word of farewell or warning.

He had made, in his own mind, a determination, when he once more clasped his wife to his heart, that he would leave the country for ever upon the first opportunity; and now that this last effort was to be made upon Guy Raymond, he resolved that it should be the means of taking him from the country.

Gideon Crawleigh greeted him with his usual coarse laugh.

"Well, you have come punctually. The old miser has gone out, I believe, so we shall have the coast clear."

They passed on towards Guy's Folly; and, on arriving at the door, they rang the bell loudly.

John Grover quickly answered the summons, and was met by a violent blow from Gideon, who, throwing himself on his prostrate form, bound his arms and gagged him.

Then they dragged him behind the shadow of the gate, and closing it, passed towards the Hall.

Here they found the door ajar, as John Grover had left it, and on the hall table was a lamp.

Everything was still—not a sign of life was in the house.

"We are in luck," whispered Crawleigh to his victim. "The old man's out, as I said, and the steward is safe enough, as we know."

Walter answered not.

There was a chill—a dread in his heart which he could not repel—a feeling that something sinister was about to happen.

He followed Gideon Crawleigh silently, therefore, as he passed up the staircase and made for the chamber where the treasures of the miser were deposited.

Arriving here without interference, Walter paused a moment at the door.

"Does not all this seem strange?" he asked. "Does it not appear to you as if some trap has been laid for us?"

"No," returned Gideon. "It is easy of explanation. I have already told you the old miser himself is out. The only servant he has is lying as good as dead in the garden. We are alone in the house, and can do exactly as we please."

With these words, he pushed open the door of the room, and passed in.

All was in complete darkness.

Gideon drew forth a dark lantern, and was proceeding to commence his depredations, when a deep voice behind him cried:

"Mr. Crawleigh, and you, my nephew, Walter, what are you doing here?"

Walter, overcome with fear and grief, did not reply—nor, indeed, had he the power to do so if he would.

Only for a moment, however, was Gideon Crawleigh taken aback.

Then, recovering himself, he made a sudden dash at the door, and had fled before any one could stop him.

Walter would have followed in his footsteps, but two men barred his passage.

These were Guy Raymond and Ralph St. Clare.

"Stay, Walter," said the miser. "I wish to speak with you. Be reasonable, and no harm shall befall you."

Resistance was completely useless, so, passing out of the room, he followed his uncle down into the basement.

Before, however, describing their conference, I must turn to Gideon Crawleigh, and narrate the events which occurred on the evening following his adventure at Raymond Park.

LOSS OF THE SHIP WILLIAM NELSON.

ONE of the most terrible disasters that ever occurred at sea was the loss of the ship William Nelson, burned off the banks of Newfoundland, on the afternoon of June 26. Of 450 passengers, most of them emigrants, but 44 were saved. The survivors were picked up by the French mail steamer Lafayette, and taken to Brest. There were six ladies among the passengers saved. The rescued all testify to many kindnesses and attentions received from the officers of the Lafayette. The following is a statement of Captain Smith, of the William Nelson:

"I was in command of the ship William Nelson, 1,039 tons, with a crew of 30 men. I left Antwerp on the 2d of June and Flessingen on the 4th, with 600 tons of merchandise and 450 emigrant passengers, for New York. On Saturday, June 26th, at 12:30, latitude 41 deg. 21 min, longitude 50 deg. 22 min. (having just taken observation), I was informed that the ship was set on fire while fumigating, and the flames spread so rapidly that I had only time to order the four boats to be lowered, which were immediately filled by those nearest, and finding all efforts useless I soon followed. The scene on board was horrible in the extreme. On the morning following the day of the fire the ship had entirely disappeared."

HOW TO PREVENT A DIVORCE.—When the senior Jonathan Trumbull was Governor of Connecticut, a gentleman called at his house, requesting to see His Excellency in private. Accordingly he was shown into his sanctum sanctorum, and the governor came forward to meet Squire W., saying, "Good-morning, sir; I am glad to see you." Squire W. returned the salutation, adding, as he did so, "I have called upon a very unpleasant errand, sir, and want your advice. My wife and I do not live happily together, and I am thinking of getting a divorce. What do you advise, sir?" The governor sat a few moments in deep thought, then, turning to Squire W., said: "How did you treat Mrs. W. when you were courting her? and how did you feel towards her at the time of your marriage?" Squire W. replied, "I treated her as kindly as I could, for I loved her dearly at that time." "Well, sir," said the governor, "go home and court her now just as you did then, and love her as when you married her. Do this in the fear of God for one year, and then tell me the result." The Governor then said, "Let us pray." They bowed in prayer and separated. When a year had passed away, Squire W. called again to see the governor, and grasping his hand, said, "I have called, sir, to thank you for the good advice you gave me, and to tell you that my wife and I are as happy as when we were first married. I cannot be grateful enough for your good council." "I am glad to hear it, Mr. W., and hope that you will continue to court your wife as long as you live." The result was, that Squire W. and his wife lived happily together to the end of life. Let those who are thinking of separation in these days, go and do likewise.

THERE is an excellent precept (says Samuel Rogers) which he who has received an injury, or who thinks that he has, would for his own sake do well to follow: "Excuse half and forgive the rest."

THE GRASSHOPPER AND THE CRICKET.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

GREEN little vaulter in the sunny grass,
Catching your heart up at the feet of June,
Sole voice that's heard amidst the lazy noon,
When even the bees lag at the summoning brass;
And you, warm little housekeeper, who class
With those who think the candles come too soon,
Loving the fire, and with your tricksome tune
Nick the glad silent moments as they pass—

O sweet and tiny cousins, that belong,
One to the fields, the other to the hearth,
Both have your sunshine; both, though small, are strong
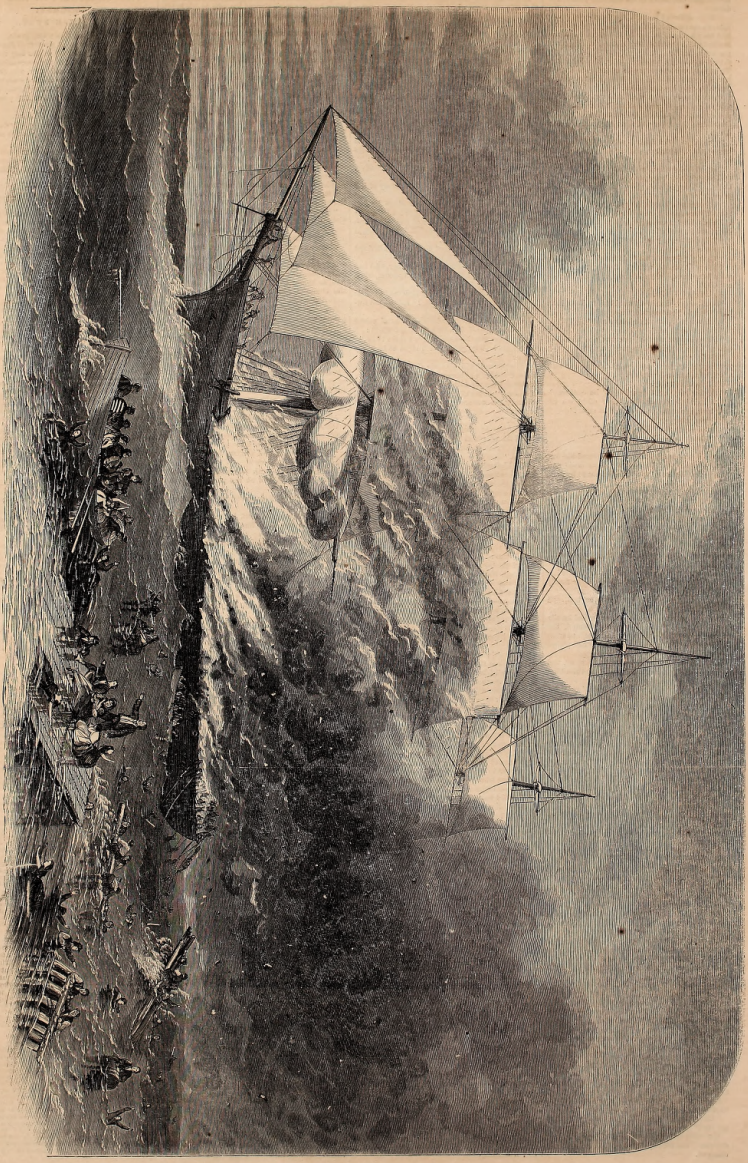
At your clear hearts; and both seem given to earth
To sing in thoughtful ears this natural song—
In doors and out, summer and winter, Mirth.

AN ADVENTUROUS CAREER.

A YOUNG man has just been sentenced to imprisonment for six months by the police court of Lille for vagrancy, whose career of crime is one of the most extraordinary ever developed before a court of justice. Pernet was born in Paris 24 years since, and at the age of 14 he committed a homicide. At 18 he was sentenced to imprisonment for five years, for robbery at Bar-le-duc. He was only eight days in the house of correction in that town when he escaped. He was captured and again committed, but he shortly escaped a second time.

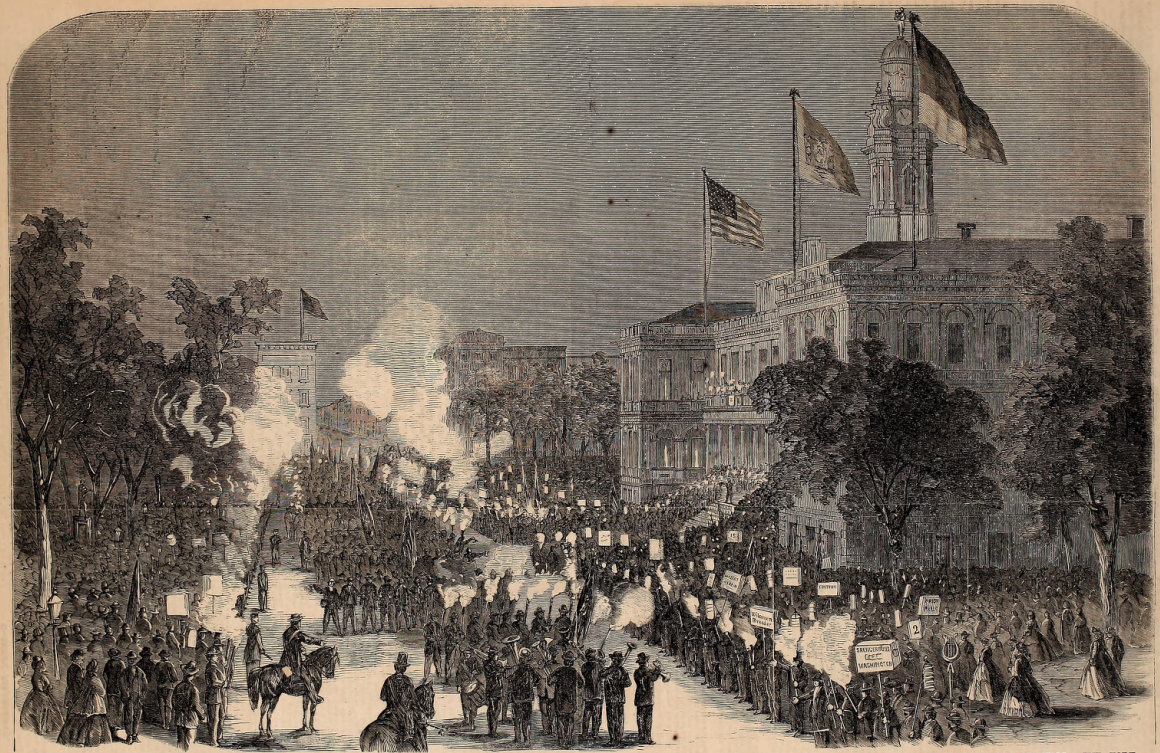
After his fifth escape from prison in France he was sentenced to 20 years' hard labor, and embarked for Cayenne at the beginning of the year 1864. Five convicts escaped from Cayenne last year, and Pernet was their leader. He assumed the command of the frail boat in which they risked their lives. They had just quitted the land when they were perceived and fired on by the guard on shore, but escaped without injury. After tossing about for 14 days and nights, nearly starved to death, they reached a British settlement. The inhabitants, mistaking them for shipwrecked seamen, treated them with the greatest kindness.

They remained some months in the settlement, when Pernet and one of his comrades, tired of the monotonous life, embarked for Spain, where they committed a robbery, and supplied themselves with a considerable sum of money and a quantity of good wearing-apparel. Pursued by the police, they took refuge in Corsica, where they passed themselves for merchants, having large establishments in Spain. Having money in their pockets, and being respectably clad, they acquired some friends, and led for a time a jovial life. Their cash was soon expended, but Pernet, nothing abashed, announced that he had lost a pocket-book containing 100,000 francs in bank-notes and valuable securities, and had it proclaimed by the public crier through the streets of Ajaccio, offering a reward of 10,000 francs for its recovery. The stratagem succeeded—for their acquaintances, taking compassion on the pretended Spaniards, placed their purses at their disposal, of which they availed themselves sparingly. They were shortly afterwards accused of a robbery of plate at the hotel where they lodged, and fled. They next appeared in Italy, where Pernet passed for a government engineer, and his companion acted the part of secretary. They were detected, but again contrived to escape.



The month of March last found Pernet in London, but British air did not agree with him, and he embarked for France, and arrived at Boulogne on the 15th of that month. He was then completely destitute, but he made the acquaintance of a charitable person in the coach between Boulogne and Lille, who afforded him some assistance, and would have procured him employment, but he declined the offer. He was arrested at Lille as a vagrant, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment, after which he is to be sent back to Cayenne.

PEACE AFTER WAR.—In riding about the country near Richmond just now, hardly anything is more noticeable than the evidences of transition from war to peace. The formidable earth-works remain, but already the grass is springing from their parapets and slopes, and the land is being cultivated up to the very ditches before them. Young corn is thrifty where was but lately the skirmish line, and the spreading maize leaves are concealing the vidette pits, while many a soldier's grave is now in a grain field. The chevaux de frise is taken for a garden fence at a house near Laurel Hill Church. At another place on the New Market road, a fence is built of the slat bottoms of hospital cots, nailed against light posts as successive lengths of railing, and thus for perhaps half a mile in all. Gen. Foster's winter log cabin, near the Four Mile Creek church, is occupied by a family, and it is more than likely that there will be quite a settlement of blacks and whites in the deserted quarters of the Union forces in that neighborhood. Where houses were torn down for their material, the old proprietors are in many instances now living in wall tents, while they cultivate their land and make ready to rebuild.



Near the Darbytown road, I found a man at work cutting wood in the forest, who had evidently been a rebel soldier, and had learned in field-life some lessons to serve him in his more peaceful occupation as a farmer. His shelter tent was set up as his quarters during his stay. His blanket was his bed. Before his tent hung his well-filled haversack, containing apparently at least two day's rations. His horse was feeding near by at an ammunition box, nailed to a tree. Soldier-like, he paid no attention to occasional passers, but swung lustily his sharp axe, as though he had been detailed to cut wood enough during the day for a breastwork along the entire front, in an exposed position. At the Gerhardt place, just beyond (the house on which was used as a hospital in the battle of October 13th, riddled in the battle of October 27th, and demolished soon after), the former occupants are back again, with tents for quarters, gardening among the graves of Union soldiers, and hoping yet to get a living from the farm which was for months directly between the picket lines of the two armies, and uninhabitable for non-combatants.

Mrs. Gerhardt, who was severely wounded by a rifle bullet, October 27, sits in her chair before her tent directing farm movements. Boys are seen going to school carrying their books in their father's old haversack as a satchel. Others are using a sabre, or a navy cutlass, as a wood cleaver. Shelter tents take place, with some, of summer house blankets, and the huge frowning guns still remaining in many of the old works doubtless serve a good purpose as scarecrows in protecting the corn-fields in their range. It is more than likely that the magazines in some of the redoubts will be used as ice-houses, and the bomb-proofs as potato cellars, and thus the southern people are learning to "beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks."

STOCKINGS.—The stockings worn by the ancients consisted of strips of linen, or of the skins of animals. The Normans wore them made of cloth, or of costly stuff, embroidered and decorated with gold and silver. Knit worsted stockings were imported from Italy in the time of Henry VIII., and were worn by the gentry of that period; and in 1530 a pair of silk stockings were sent to that monarch from Spain. In the time of Queen Elizabeth it was common for young men of rank to wear stockings of different fashions and colors on each leg. In 1561 the first pair of silk stockings were knit in England, and were presented to the queen; about the same period the method of knitting worsted stockings was brought to England. In the year 1589 a machine for weaving stockings was introduced by William Lee, and this laid the foundation of the extensive stocking manufacture now carried on in England.

APPALLING CALAMITY—BURNING OF THE SHIP WILLIAM NELSON, OFF THE BANKS OF NEWFOUNDLAND, MONDAY, JUNE 26.—LOSS OF OVER FOUR HUNDRED LIVES.

THE GREAT SAENGERFEST BY THE COMBINED GERMAN SINGING SOCIETIES OF THE UNITED STATES—THEIR RECEPTION BY THE MAYOR AND NEW YORK SINGING SOCIETIES AT THE CITY HALL, NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 15TH, AT MIDNIGHT.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. ALBERT BERGHAUS.

THE TRIUMPH.

BY GEORGE P. PECK.

Lo, Richmond falls!
Beneath its walls
Foul treason dies by loyal hand!
And by this sign,
With blood for wine,
We pledge—Our reunited land!

Lo, Richmond falls!
Hoary cannon-calls
Proclaim it from the crimsoned plain!
And by this sign,
Their bleed for wine,
We pledge—The memories of the slain!

Lo, Richmond falls!
That word uppals
Its lightning glare o'er future's gloom!
And by this sign,
Its blood for wine,
We pledge—Accursed slavery's doom!

Lo, Richmond falls!
Our triumph galls
The quaking tyrannies of earth!
And by the sign,
Our blood for wine,
We pledge—Truth's universal birth!

Lo, Richmond falls!
Our heart recalls
Dear hearts and homes whose sighings cease!
And by this sign,
Its blood for wine,
We pledge—The coming Prince of Peace!

Something Like a Conjuror.

Those who have seen Indian conjurors will not think much of the poor tricks of American conjurors, clumsy and ill-executed as they usually follows, the narrator tells what he and a couple of friends, who had a month's holiday-run in the Deccan, saw with their own eyes.

Early in the morning, after our arrival at Poonah, we were lounging in the verandah of the Dawk bungalow, with a loud tom-tomming called attention, and we saw a procession entering the compound of the bungalow. First came two stout bodyguard fellows with long black hair and red puggarees, hearing like madmen with their long fingers on a couple of tomtoms. Then followed three or four boys dragging huge snakes over their shoulders. Next marched a tall old man, richly dressed in silks, followed closely by two or three coolies carrying boxes. Some ragged followers with spears caused the procession. The party went round to the back of the bungalow, and presently our eyes brought to us the old gentleman in the verandah, who bowed to the ground, touched his forehead, mouth, and breast to us, and began a long address, in which we were plentifully honored as protectors of the poor, lords, masters, and royal highnesses. As for him, he was a poor snake-charmer, devil-tamer, and general doctor of animals. He had heard that some illustrious lord-sahibs had arrived, so he was come to serve us. If there were any sick cow in the house he would draw them out. If there were any grey hairs in our heads he would cause them to fall out and leave more return. If any of our horses were possessed with a devil, he would cure them. In fact, he would do anything for us by the power of his art. We said we had no grey hairs or unruly horses, but we would like to see some of his juggling and snake-charming. He replied that he was very shy, and where should he serve us: in the verandah or the bungalow? We said on the sand in front of the verandah, where all was open, and we could watch his movements.

In a few minutes the whole party came round from the back of the house, and formed a semicircle with our servants and followers. In the middle, with at least ten yards of clear space around him, sat the conjuror. By his side squatted a little nigger boy with a large box in his arms, while a word or two in Mahratta or Hindustanee language from the old conjuror, he opened and brought for our inspection. On looking in we saw a mass of snakes twisted in a lump, lying in a blanket fast asleep. The box was put on the ground a few yards from the conjuror, while the lid open. We could hear a sort of fan-pipe, and began to play a slow and mournful air. We, from our post on the verandah, could look down into the box, and in a few seconds saw the snakes beginning to unwind. One who was first detached from the lump reared over the side of the box to the ground. The moment he was on the sand he stiffened, reared his head, opened the hood which extended at the back of his face, and hissed violently, shooting his tongue very swiftly in and out. Meanwhile, the air-player began to play more quickly and softly, and the snake, turning towards him, gradually approached him. More snakes now rose on his hind, some came out of the others looked over the edge, but all were hissing and looking venomous. Some went close to the man and boy, and even crawled on their clothes. They were handled with the greatest composure: both the old man and the boy taking hold of their necks from behind, as a keeper handles ferrets. But whenever any of the snakes approached the circle of spectators, it was hooked by the neck, with great appearance of dismay. On those occasions the old man redoubled the energy of his music, and generally succeeded in entering the snakes back, but sometimes the boy had to go and fetch them. After we had looked at this performance for some minutes, one of our party observed that he believed it was all humbug, that their teeth had been extracted, and their venom-bags cut out. At any rate, he announced his intention of collaring the first snake that came near the verandah. We objected in vain, and when presently a very active-looking cobra that had been several times fetched back by the boy approached our verandah, and the conjurer had turned his head away for an instant, with a sudden dart our friend had it by the back of the neck, and pumped down with it into the compound, holding it high over his head, and shouting to the conjuror that anything else for his money? As the audience saw what he had done, they set up a tremendous yell. The old conjuror seemed terrified, and rushed at the bold Englishman, playing his pipe like a madman. But our friend kept away from him, and swung the hissing cobra in the air. The old man retreated, and to throw it in the box, and after marching all round the compound and frightening the coolies and spectators, began with it at the faces in the little crowd, he threw the snake into the blanket. The boy, in the meantime, had picked up the cobra, and returned them to the box. When he had all in, the old charmer shut the box and sat on it, and panted. This interruption put an end to the snake-charming. I do not believe that the snakes had been tampered with, but our friend, who had a grip of the head of the snake he first seized, so tight, and so close to its head, that it was powerless. He told us that he only got away, and was almost as hot to hold as an eel.

Our slave in the shrubs having taken up his position in the same place as before, the old man put in his left a common basket about two feet high and a foot across. The old man announced that he was about to cause a mango-tree to grow out of the sand. We had heard this trick much talked about, and watched it closely. The conjuror first scraped a little hole in the sand, and put in a mango-seed. When he had covered it up he asked us for a little water. I went and poured about a gallon over it, wetting the sand all around. The old man then put the basket over the hole, and sat on it, keeping it down for about twenty minutes. While we were waiting, he asked for three teaseeps, and said he would cause a mango-tree to grow out of the roof while away the time. He put the three cups on the ground in front of him, the hole with the mango-seed being in the middle. He took the left, and no one else within at least four yards, except ourselves, and we sat in the verandah and saw his feet from the back. He asked us to mark a piece of chuppatsie. I marked a piece with the number of my regiment, and he showed me that it was still there. He closed his mouth, chewed, swallowed, then opened his mouth, which we examined, and found empty. Then he put the chuppatsie with one piece of chuppatsie should be under. I whispered to a comrade, "Now he will put your piece under the middle cup, the boy can get to it." I then answered, "The middle." My comrade immediately kicked that cup over, and down it fell empty. The old man laughed at the old fellow, but he merely said, "Hal—it is there!" and turning to his boy, said, "Serapa ka andar dekho!" (Look in the cup!) and with his fingers scratched the sand all there appeared a piece of chuppatsie exactly like ours, and different from any, and otherwise corresponding to the piece he had eaten.

The old man then took a piece of chapattie, and in our presence marked it with an Arabic character or two, and gave it to one of ourselves to keep. He then took the cup from the middle of the cups facing us, and taking some sand in his hand, shook it over each cup, and said, "Where is the piece?" We said we saw it under the middle cup, and thought it a sure joke to cry out in answer, "Under all." But he quietly lifted the cup in front and each had a piece of chapattie exactly corresponding to the one our friend had eaten. This trick could not have been performed by sleight of hand, as the cups were ours, and the ground was open road. It was pure sleight of hand. But the time he took to do it, namely, from the time he stood round when the old man lifted the basket, and there, from the centre of the wet patch, rose a green shoot about three inches high, was put down on our knees and examined it. We were told not to touch it, as it was delicate. But it was evidently a mango, and was growing. The old man then covered it up, and said, "In ten minutes the tree will be made."

He then asked if any two huge hose we had seen the boys dragging along, and they fetched them from under a piece of matting. They were as large as a man's thigh, and apparently about five feet long; and were covered with a thick scratch themselves to twelve or fifteen feet. He had had them since they were a few inches long, and had fed them on milk, and they had grown very tame and tepid. There were no tricks in them. We handled them, and stroked their skins. The conjuror ordered the cobra to be put, and would be worth seeing was to eat.

He asked whether we had a goat or a sheep to give him to eat. We had none. A couple of dogs were brought in a sack; one a wretched-looking pariah puppy, the other a large, fat, well-fed, sleek dog—by-the-other a big rough yellow fellow, wriggling and snapping like a fresh-caught pike. The conjuror looked at the latter with a grin and a hitch—one had been taken away, as, if fed in each other's presence, they are apt to fasten on each other—become lively and opened his eyes. A piece of string was fastened to the dog's hind leg, and the cobra being sent off to his hole, was a rush away, but brought up in a few yards by the string. He turned savagely round to bite the string, and caught sight of the boy now approaching him with rapid wriggles. He jaw dropped, and he crunched down, casting his eyes about, and attempt a low snarl as the foam ran out of his mouth. We pelted the poor brute, and wanted them to let him go, but the charmer said that a hoa-sahib was rather a ticklish customer when his gastric juices was stimulated, until he had got a mouthful. The boy, now close to the dog, was twisting and writhing in every direction; at one time shooting himself out until he was a dozen feet long and hardly as thick as a man's arm; then shutting up into a mass three or four feet long and thick round as a man. At the last, raising half his body in the air, he brought it down with a whack on the unfortunate beast's back, the dog appearing by this time almost inanimate. It was thus killed, and in two or three minutes became a mis-shapen mass. The boy then severed the body with sailors, and, turning his head round, his tail still encircling the dog, he took the head into his mouth with one stride. A second time the boys who had carried the animal ran up, and with a chopper cut off the four legs and the tail close to the carcass. We were told they were apt to disagree with the snake, and make him sulk. In fact, the fewer bones the hoa eats the better for him.

It was rather a sickening sight, and we urged them to let the other dog go. They did so, and the poor brute ran away at a great rate when they started him.

We left the hoa to gorge his dog, which was slowly disappearing, and went back to the basket where the mango was growing, and on which sat the old fellow, keeping our eyes all the time. The conjuror lifted it up, and there appeared a little mango shoot; in fact, a young tree, about a foot high, with several pulled off several of the leaves, and ate them. They had the peculiar acrid taste of the mango. I wanted to pull it up and see the roots, but my request was not attended to. The old man would not consent to that on any terms. He said it would kill the tree, and I fear I should. We wished to see more tricks, but he refused to perform any more in spite of him. However, he sent for an old pot, carefully transplanted the mango, taking up a ball of earth, and sent it away by one of his boys. He said it was to have it planted in some garden.

This is the smallest trick I have seen in Hindostan, and is done in all parts, I believe. The jugglers throughout Asia are all of one clan, and their performances, though ingenious and sometimes dancing girls, the secrets of the trade having handed down from father to son. Certainly the trick is the most ancient of growing; it was bright and fresh-looking, and its leaves and stalks were soft. The mango of that dragged on experience which hangs about anything just transplanted or stuck in the ground.

The conjuror could not, that, for his next trick, he must be somewhere out of the glare of the sun, and sheltered from any air which might blow the sand. Accordingly he adjourned to the verandah. The conjuror spread a piece of matting, and squatted, produced four brass pots, and placed them in a row, the mouths in front of him. The contents were a quantity of little bits of wood; probably the dry branches of a tree or shrub, each a few inches long; besides these there were some fifteen or twenty little brass cylinders with a bullion inch long. The old man chose one of the straightest and thickest of the bits of wood, and, turning his face up to the sky, placed the tip of his nose. The little boy who sat by him henceforth handed him whatever he called for. First came a piece of cotton-wool which he poised on the piece already there, then a forked piece, to which he gradually made additions, and he had soon built up a fine piece with two branches. He always kept his balance by adding simultaneously on each side, holding on with his hand, and never once taking his eyes off the fabric. Soon the two branches became four, the four eight, and so on, until a bundle of wood was formed about two feet high, and branching out so as to overshadow his whole face; he could just reach with his hand to get the finishing touch on. It was a wonderful structure, and we all held our breath as he added the last bits. When it was at its height the boy put in behind him the little birds, and, still two at a time, one in each hand, he stuck them in the wood. The complete immobility of his head and neck while he was balancing this structure on the tip of his nose was something wonderful. Not a hair must have been moved through his care, for there was not the slightest perceptible motion about nose or mouth. After putting all the birds he passed, and we, thinking the trick was finished, began to applaud. But he held up his forefinger for silence. Then the little boy put into one of his hands a short hollow reed, and into the other some dried peas. He then put a pea in his mouth, and, with the reed as a pea shooter, took aim and shot off the branch one of the birds. The kneah flew away, and we well calculated that it was gone as perceptible movement to his face; it just sent the pea far enough to hit a particular bird on a particular branch, and it flew. Not another thing on the tree moved. Another pea was fired in the same way, and another bird brought down. Then all the birds were brought down. The fire was then directed at the branches and limbs of the tree, and, beginning from the top of the wood, the whole of this astonishing structure was demolished piece by piece with perfect regularity and precision.

We never said by a word like, whether we his son, who had a wonderful skin inside and out, thinking, no doubt, that we were fools. He then shouted out for him, calling some outlandish name; but his followers, who evidently knew whom he wanted, cried out "Lendore!" In a few moments a yellow-skinned boy, of about twelve or fourteen, appeared, dressed only with a bit of red calico round his loins. The old man said whether we had any heavy weights, and we produced two bags of shot, weighing about fourteen pounds. He took a piece of string to each of these, and a fish-hook at the other end of the string then, taking the boy by the arm, put his hands and knees and put his head close to the ground, he put a fish-hook through the lobe of each ear, and the boy, slowly lifting his head, raised the shot bags from the ground and moved along on his hands and knees. The ears did not bleed, but were drawn to a considerable length, and I expected to see the hooks tear out; but nothing happened. After he had crept some twenty yards he returned, and the hooks were taken out of his ears. The next operation was more horrible to look at. The hooks were actually inserted in the upper eyelids, near the inner corner, and as the boy raised his head the eyelids were drawn half-way down his cheeks. But he raised the bags by his eyelids, and moved along as before. A little of this sort of performance went a long way, and we soon cried "Enough!"

He now announced that the boy would swallow the sword. We had heard stories about the swordblade's pushing up into the bill, and so forth. We examined the sword closely, therefore, when it was produced. It was a common two-edged sword, about an inch broad and two feet long. The edges were very thin, and the point was quite pinked. It was evidently kept for the purpose, but there was nothing false about the bill. The boy first filled his stomach with melted ghee from a cup which one of our shikhmutgars brought, and then stood bolt upright, with his face turned up, his mouth wide and full of ghee. The old man eyed behind him, and inserted the point of the sword between his lips and teeth, and gradually pushed it down, until the hilt touched the teeth; the ghee had in the meantime run down his chest. We were now told to come and feel the sword in his stomach. We pressed our fingers just where the ribs separate in front, and there we could distinctly feel the end of the sword. As soon as we were satisfied, the sword was slowly drawn out, and, beyond a retch or two, the boy's stomach did not seem to be upset by this skilful introduction of a thick probe through the gullet.

The old man now said he must bring the performance to a close, but before going would show something more wonderful than anything we had seen yet.

"Sahibs," he said, "you saw me make the mango-tree grow out of the sand in the same spot I will make this cholra," putting his hand on the head of the yellow leather-skinned boy, "disappear into the earth." He did not think it very likely that he could do this under our very noses without our detection of the trick. However, we composed ourselves on the floor of the verandah, our servants and the old man's followers forming a semicircle in front of and facing us. In the centre sat the old man and the old conjuror; in front of him squatted the yellow-skinned boy. The old conjuror asked for a basket, and one of our servants brought him an old hamper from the outhouses. He took it up and placed it over the boy, telling us to cover him altogether. At the moment of his doing this I remembered afterwards several persons clustered up round him as if to help in placing what he did. He placed the basket was on, the old man said, "Does it press on you?" The peculiar shrill voice of the boy from the basket was heard in reply, "It does not, sahib." The old man then kept up for half hour, answered from underneath, "Yes, it presses on my head," or "It is quite, quite easy as it is," or "It is," said the old man, "and don't keep the sahibs waiting." In about ten seconds the boy's voice said, "I am now sitting down, and can move in my way." "Nonsense," said the old man; "if you are not gone in two minutes I'll stop you." Some more whispering was then heard from the boy whining, and the old man scolding and getting angry. At last we said, "Oh, let the little fellow come out, for the trick is one which we are watching, and we never thought you would."

This only made the old conjuror more angry. He threw down curses and swear in Mahratee fluently, declaring he had never before failed in a trick, and he thought at him until he worked himself into a rage that was hideous to see. He tore his puggeree off, threw his arms about, and, all of a sudden, seemed to know what was going on below, so he seized a spear from one of his followers and plunged it into the basket. A hideous scream and a terrific commotion immediately took place upon the sand. Then, seizing the spear, he jobbed it repeatedly through the basket, shrieks following every stroke. Blood flowed like water. We were astounded, for we did not know whether this was a trick or not. We called on our servants to seize the old fellow, but they seemed to be frightened, and at last two of us, jumping out of the verandah, dragged him off by main muscle. The diabolical old man was so intent on jobbing in the spear, that he paid no attention to our commands. He continued to job in the basket. I pushed to the basket and picked it up. There was nothing under it. Only the ground was covered with blood. We called our servants again, and the old conjuror, as soon as he could get his throat from my friend's grip, said, "Bhoot, bhoot! I am undone!" and ordered the sand that fell into the earth, and as he wouldn't go quietly I had to force him off. Suddenly we heard the little boy's peculiar shrill voice in the distance, calling out, "Here I am, sahibs!" Everybody turned their heads in that direction, and there was the boy at the gate of the compound, was the yellow-skinned boy.

A present of ten rupees sent away the old conjuror and his party, delighted. How many rupees would that old fellow and the yellow-skinned boy make if they came to London and made an exhibit of communion with spirits, or that they didn't themselves know how they did what they did?

A SCHEME FOR POWER OF COMMUNICATION.—Mr. Alexander Bain, a scientific gentleman, formerly of Columbia Mexico was inhabited by a semi-civilized race, who had carried on rigorous cities, and who combined mercantical government and settled civil policy, with which the wars of grass and peaceable commerce. He proposes to extend the wonder of the Spanish conquerors, and yet these two great communities, though living in each close neighborhood, were wholly ignorant of each other's existence! The new work is being pushed rapidly forward of constructing a telegraph between Asia and America will be in instantaneous communication with each other.

DESOLATE.

BY E. A. M.

Thro' the hour-glass run the sands,
While the minutes die;
Desolate sit I,
With white face leant on my hands.

'Tis dreary watching the rain—
The black drops chatter;
Let them—what matter—
They cannot add to my pain.

To-night my heart will not sleep,
No old cradle song
Will lull her for long,
She wearies me—"dear heart, sleep."

And the gray dawn comes at last,
Peering in at me;
I wonder did she
Meet a phantom gliding past?

Why will the dismal rain stay?
The black drops patter,
And darkly chatter
Of secrets unmeet for day.

Thro' the hour-glass runs the sand,
Nor faster nor slow,
Come weal or come woe,
Steadly moves Time's firm hand.

We may go mad—what matter—
Or die of despair,
What then? Who would care?
Magpies round us would chatter.

A Terrible Tornado.

The 11th of August, 1831, is a day that will never pass from my memory while I have an existence. My residence at that time was in Bridgetown, on the island of Barbadoes; but the evening preceding I had ridden a few miles into the country, to spend the night at the house of a friend, with whom resided a young lady, a niece, that has since become bound to me by the closest of all earthly ties.

I reached my friend Palmer's house a little after sunset on the night of the 10th, and found the whole family seated upon the piazza, with the addition of a couple of gentlemen, neighbors, who had dropped in for an evening's social call, and one of them, a young and single man, perhaps with a design similar to my own. The servants took charge of my horse, and I joined the group. The moment the first cordial family greetings and introductions were over, the weather as usual was brought in, to start a subject of conversation in which everybody could take a part.

"It is very warm," said one.

"Excessively so," said another.

"And not a breath stirring," joined in a third.

"And the heavens like a glowing furnace," added a fourth.

"Did you see the sun set to-night, Mr. Grainger?" said Miss Clara Templeton, the young lady I have mentioned, turning to me.

"I did."

"Oh, was it not magnificently beautiful—beyond the pen of the poet, or pencil of artist?"

"It was indeed glorious," I responded, catching some of her enthusiasm.

"I don't like it," said Mr. Graysen, one of the two neighbors alluded to, and who was a plain, blunt man; "these beautiful red sunsets don't bode any good on this island—a storm generally follows; and, if I'm not mistaken, we'll soon have to pay up for all this pretty sky-painting."

"Why there is no more poetry in your soul than in a column of figures!" cried Miss Templeton, with a gay laugh. "Come, let us have a more cheerful prophecy. Mr. Grainger, are you weatherwise?"

"I fear I am *other*wise," I laughed.

The sunset had certainly been one of the most beautiful I ever saw, and even yet the western sky was all aglow, the soft flush reaching far up toward the zenith, and delightfully blending with the blue above. The air was still, almost painfully so, as if Nature were holding her breath in solemn awe; and somehow the mind was led to take on this impression, even to sadness, as I have heard more than one remark since the dire events of that awful night.

A little after nine o'clock the neighbors visiting at my friend's house took their leave, and presently the family, with the exception of Clara, retired to rest. For some time we remained on the piazza, conversing in low tones, and then withdrew to the parlor, which faced the west, the inner shutters of which were closed. As lovers then, destined to the nearest and dearest ties of relationship, we had a thousand tender nothings to say, which concerned no one but ourselves, and which would not bear repeating. Time flew by on golden wings, unheeded and unnoted, and an hour or two passed away as so many minutes.

Suddenly we were startled by a favorite cat springing into the room from the one adjoining, mewing as if from fright, and running crouchingly around the walls, with distended and glaring eyes. At the same time we first became conscious of a strange, sullen roar, and that the wind was already blowing quite fiercely, a matter that we had not before noticed, owing to the pre-occupation of our minds. I looked at Clara and saw that she was pale with fear.

"Something terrible!" she said, in a nervous whisper.

"Only a storm," I replied, assuming an indifference I did not feel.

She pointed to the cat, and rejoined:

"Unerring instinct often tells the brute creation more than our reason does us. I fear this is only the beginning of a terrible tempest."

As she spoke, and as if in confirmation of her words, a lurid flash was visible through the cracks of the shutters, and was instantly followed by a crash that fairly brought us to our feet.

"Oh, merciful God!" exclaimed Clara, sinking back upon her seat, and covering her eyes with her hands.

"Do not be alarmed, dearest," said I, tenderly; "it is only a storm such as we often have on the island, and will soon be over."

From this moment the wind rapidly increased in fury, and in the course of an hour the roar of the tempest, commingled with the howlings and shriekings of the wind and crashing of the thunder, had become so great that the human voice could only be distinguished when pitched on its highest key. For some time I had felt very anxious and uneasy, but now I was thoroughly alarmed, and Clara was so frightened as scarcely to be able to speak or move. Furious as the wind already was, it was still increasing, and more than once I felt the house tremble and rock. What the end was to be Heaven only knew.

The air, which during the early part of the night had been oppressively close and warm, had now become disagreeably cold; and seeing Clara shiver, I went and got a shawl from the adjoining room and threw it over her shoulders.
